be mentioned without a great deal of scandal. Well my children, when I came here first to take charge of this respectable flock, (and indeed respectable it is,) that is, when I was sent here by the Pope, this congregation, as you all know was under the care of a man, who had a truly ecclesiastical heart, the Rev. Mr de Bart, now, I was told from undoubted authority indeed, that this person did not only not obey, this pious superior, but always looked upon him as his inferior; now my children the doctrine of every theologian, which cannot be denied, is that every inferior should be subject to every superior. Well, that now is my first charge. Now my next is that this person never read his office. I was told so indeed by undoubted authority; and my conscience told me that I as being the church, that is being the head of the church, I mean the representative of the church in this diocess, could not in conscience allow him to go to the altar: for there is seven parts in the office that every priest is bound to say every day, under pain of mortal sin. That is, mattins and lauds, one, prime, two, terce, three, sext, four, none, five, vespers, six, and complin seven. Now my children every priest, as I said before, is bound to read them seven hours under pain of mortal sin, and my conscience could not allow me to let him offer up the mass in a state of mortal sin: for any priest that would do it, is not worthy of being a priest. Now that is my second charge. There is a great deal more charges that I have against this person, but they are so scandalous that I am delicate and ashamed to mention them; but as I am brought to it I must tell you, though as I said before, I am ashamed to mention it, the charges are so shocking that I would not think it safe for me in my conscience, to allow any of my females, I mean any of my young girls into the same room with this person. Now my children, when I had all these in my conscience, and many others that I am ashamed to mention, why do you continue to persecute me by asking me to restore this person, but I must tell you and I am bound to do so, that there is no use in endeavouring to force me to do so, for I am bishop and I must act as my conscience bids me; that I never will restore faculties to this person in my diocess; and again I tell you I will not be forced to it, for I am bishop; for if this house was full of dollars, as much as it could hold, (for I don't care for money, nor never did,) and there were twenty cannons placed before this church, I would not for all them dollars, and if I were to be shot afterwards by these twenty cannons, give that person faculties in my diocess. So let me beg of you my children no longer to ask me. In a pamphlet that lately came out, he says I deprived him of his living, and he styles himself pastor of St Mary's Church. No, I deny it, I never deprived him of a living, for he had no living in this diocess, because any act of the vicar general was not binding unless confirmed by the church, that is by the bishop. Now I did not confirm his being in St Mary's and he could not then call it his living. Moreover he was no pastor, he could not be pastor, for what is a pastor, the word pastor comes from the Latin word pasco to feed, now it only belongs to the church to feed the flock. And I as being the church, that is the representative of the church, am and can be the only pastor in this diocess: he therefore never was, nor never will be pastor in this diocess. In his late pamphlet he has endeavoured to blindfold a part of the congregation and set them astray, throwing dust in their eyes, but I shall soon satisfy you my children on that head, Oh! them canons he quoted, are long ago obsolete and are no more binding than a law passed in the reigns of queen Anne or Richard III. or William the Conqueror are at present binding in England: Oh! them laws were done away in the Council of Trent and new ones made, which are to be interpreted by the church of God. Now my children I am the church, for I am the bishop I mean I am the representative of the church, and my children I will give you full satisfaction about them before a few days. I came over here from Ireland; I was sent here by the Pope with extraordinary powers to act in a Papal way, as my conscience directed me. I therefore request of you my flock, not to trouble me any more, for I am resolved not to be forced against my conscience. I have been told that there is a few individuals of the congregation holding meetings and making resolutions to frighten me. Oh it will not do, there was a meeting at Mr Bazely's the other night, I was told there was some people, who think they are very clever in making speeches, and going about speaking those speeches publicly and privately, to make converts, those persons may be looked upon by this person to be his friends but they are his greatest enemies. I see by some papers that are pasted upon the walls that there is to be another meeting at Mr Bazely's on Wednesday next in order to force this person into this church; Oh, but it is all of no use, these persons as I said before are the greatest enemies to this person. Now my children as I see by these meetings and also from a pamphlet lately published that this person contrary to all church authority intends to again discharge the priestly functions. I feel myself bound as your pastor, to save you my flock from the jaws of the wolf which would disperse them, to let you know that if any such step be taken by this person, I shall without delay proceed to the most disagreeable necessity in the world, which is that of separating this person from the flock entrusted to my charge, and not only him, but any person that shall hold any communion with him afterwards.

I beg you then my flock to think with yourselves and not put me to this painful necessity, and I hope this person will think with himself upon his state and no longer listen to these bad advisers, and not put me to this necessity, I hope he will think with himself upon his poor soul, and perhaps I may do something for him yet. The person I mean is now listening to me, may God grant, he will hear this advice, and I beg of you all my dear children to pray for his poor soul. The next pastoral address will not be kept so long from the public."

This is a true copy of the pastoral charge of the Right Reverend the bishop of Philadelphia; and I shall take care to preserve the original American impression, to satisfy the curious, some of whom may suspect that it is a piece of home manufacture, intended to burlesque Popish learning.

It is right that Mr Hogan should be heard a few words in his own defence. Every reasonable man will allow that he has met with hard measures. He came to Philadelphia with a fair character, and a very ample certificate to that effect by TUOHY, bishop of Limerick. He acquired the good opinion of the congregation of St Mary's, by great diligence in the discharge of his official duties; and by condescending even to become a sabbath school teacher, for the sake of the young of his flock. His Address to his congregation commences in the following manner; and I think it looks very like the appeal of an honest man:—

"I should be truly ungrateful and undeserving the attentions that have been shown me since my arrival in this city, did I not endeavour to rescue my character from the imputations which the base machinations and unmanly envy of a few individuals would fain throw upon it. It is with reluctance, I would upon any occasion, presume to intrude on the public attention; but it is with heartfelt pain I do it on the present, knowing how fatal to religion the exposing of perfidy and unmasking of clerical hypocrisy must necessarily be. I have done all in my power, to bring those who have endeavoured to injure me, to a sense of the impropriety of their conduct, and effect a reconciliation between us. For any supposed offence that I might have given them, I offered to make an adequate apology, but no apology would be listened to from me, no apology would be made for the injury done me. It is well known that I have been deprived of my living in St Mary's Church, by the Right Rev. Dr Conwell: this step he has taken without giving me any previous notice or admonition, and without assigning any cause for so doing. In vain have I asked why I have been deprived of my living, in vain have the congregation asked why they have been deprived of my services, in vain have I appealed to the Metropolitan, the Archbishop of Baltimore, in vain have I protested against the precipitancy and injustice of such proceedings against me, no appeal from me will be listened to, and no reason will be assigned for thus injuring me, by depriving me of my living. This is cruel treatment, and unparalleled in the annals of ecclesiastical despotism. Were I so fortunate to live in those happy times, "when kings could do no wrong, or bishops in their individual capacities err," then I should tamely submit; if I had been in a catholic country where the civil authorities would interfere, if I had been in a country where I could appeal to an unprejudiced tribunal, I should quietly await its decision, and cheerfully submit to it; but circumstanced as I am, having no one to appeal to, except a professed enemy, I am reluctantly obliged to have recourse to this mode of vindicating my character."

In the sequel it appears, that the Popish priests who were settled in Philadelphia before him, were persons of character so contemptible, that Mr Hogan could not, without sacrificing his own character, associate with them; and this seems to have been one of the secret reasons why he incurred the displeasure of his bishop, and suffered so much persecution. Truly that must be a holy church that nourishes and brings up such sons!

No. CLXXV.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 17TH, 1821.

IN my last Number I introduced an American Popish bishop to the reader's acquaintance; and I gave an example of arbitrary government on his part, which shows that the system receives no amelioration even in that land of freedom. Some of the republican congregation did indeed venture to remonstrate with their bishop; but they could not move him to depart from his purpose of removing the obnoxious priest, whose presence he said was dangerous to the morals of his diocess, particularly of his young girls; but he would give him a recommendation to another diocess; and, in language as dignified as that of his printed address, he told the gentleman who took the priest's part, "He has a light pair of heels, and a clean pair of breeches, and the world is wide for him." Hogan's Address, p. 12.

Speaking of the United States of America, I am reminded of the only thing that remains to be mentioned on the subject of making Papists eligible to places of power in a Protestant country. It is argued, that there are no political distinctions on account of religion in that country; that a Papist or a Deist is as eligible to the highest office in the state as a Protestant, and that no evil whatever has resulted from this arrangement. I admit the fact, that such is the law in the United States; but then I maintain, that that is not a Protestant country, in any proper sense of the words. The majority of the people in some of the States are, indeed, Protestants; and in others, at least in Maryland, a vast proportion, if not the majority, are Papists; and the greatest man in that part of the world is the archbishop of Baltimore, who formerly claimed jurisdiction over that, and all the territory southward to the Floridas; but the Pope has lately given the Carolinas and Georgia to the newly created bishop of Charleston, as mentioned in my last. Be the majority in any, or in all the States, what it may, it is certain that the United States, as such, is not a Protestant country. The Protestant religion is not acknowledged by its government any more than the Romish, though, in the establishment of all their institutions, they had the advantage of Protestant experience and example. Politically considered, the United States form no part of what is called Christendom. I am not going to inquire into the disadvantages, or the advantages of this state; my business is merely with the fact: and such being the fact, it must be very evident that the admission of Papists to places of power and authority in these States, is not attended by the same danger, as in Protestant Britain and Ireland, where every established institution would become their prey.

Papists have no motive to overturn the American government, for they would gain nothing by it. There are no church lands there, no tythes, and no estates forfeited by the treasons of their ancestors. In short, there are none of those retrospections which exist in a country where Popery was once established,* and which, in the very nature of the thing, make Papists desire the overthrow of the present, and the re-establishment of the ancient order.

If it be admitted that no evil has arisen from the admission of Papists to places of power, it ought also to be admitted, that the Americans have not yet had time for a fair trial. It was many centuries before Rome was able to enslave England and Scotland, especially the latter; and she may at this moment be working her way to dominion in the continent of America, without the enlightened citizens of those States being able to perceive it; though very probably, their children shall see it, and feel it too.

Hitherto there have been what our old divines called lets, in the way. The American government was scarcely settled when the French revolution took place, which unhinged the whole European system; and none were more affected by it than the Pope and his clergy. Holding their power, and even their lives, at the will of the French emperor, they could do little in the way of propagating the faith in foreign countries. Most of the Papists who had settled in America, were poor emigrants from Ireland, or French refugees from St Domingo, and other colonies, who had fled for their lives at the time of the massacre by the negroes. With little property and less learning, they could make little way among their more intelligent neighbours. We may judge of the state of literature among them from the composition of HIS ILLUSTRIOUS LORDSHIP, THE RIGHT REVEREND THE LORD BISHOP OF PHILADELPHIA,† which I gave in my last Number. A flock that requires, and can be profited by the instruction of such a pastor, will not speedily find way to high offices in the state, and, therefore, they can do no evil in that way.

But the Pope was not restored to the posses-

* I recollect having seen this subject set in a clear light by PHILOPATRIS, in one of his letters in the Morning Post. I cannot refer to the date; but it was while the subject of "emancipation" was last pending in Parliament.

† Nothing can be more absurd and riduculous than the high sounding titles which these eleemosynary bishops take to themselves, and give to one another. Those of the Church of England are peers of the realm, in virtue of the baronies attached to their sees; and are therefore styled their Lordships: but for the Popish bishops, who subsist upon what they can collect from the inferior clergy, and poor laity, to assume such a style, is more ridiculous than the mock royalty of King Crispin. The following certificate, prefixed to the bishop of Charleston's "Pastoral Letter" is a fine specimen of such Popish puff:—

"Note.—The bull of his holiness Pope Pius VII. for separating the States of North-Carolina and South-Carolina and Georgia from the diocess of Baltimore, and for erecting for their government a new episcopal see, in the city of Charleston, (S. C.) suffragan to Baltimore, and appointing the right reverend Doctor John England, bishop thereof, was published in the Roman Catholic Church of Charleston, on Sunday the 31st of December, 1820.

The certificate of consecration, of which the following is a correct translation, was also then read:

"We, John Murphy, by the grace of God and of the Apostolic See, Bishop of Cork, in Ireland, certify to all whom it does or may concern, that on the twenty-first day of September, to wit, on the festival day of St Matthew the apostle in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and twenty; by virtue of the annexed apostolic letters having first received from him the profession of Catholic faith, and the oath of fealty to our Lord Pope Pius VII. and the holy Roman Church; we, celebrating mass in pontifical robes, in the church of Saint Finbar, patron of our diocess, have bestowed the grace of consecration on John England, a priest of Cork, chosen for a new bishop of the church of Charleston; being assisted therein by the right reverend and most illustrious Lords, Kieran Marum, Bishop of Ossory, and Patrick Kelly, Bishop of Richmond; there being also present the most reverend and most illustrious Lord Patrick Everard, Archbishop of Mitylene, and coadjutor to the Archbishop of Cashel, the right reverend and most illustrious Lords, William Coppinger, Bishop of Cloyne and Ross, Charles Sughrue, Bishop of Ardfert and Aghadoe, and Charles Tuohy, Bishop of Limerick. In testimony whereof we have written these presents with our hand, and affixed to them our episcopal seal.

Given from our residence in Cork the day and year above.

[L. S.] JOHN MURPHY, Bishop of Cork."

sion of sovereign power twelve months, till he took measures for extending his dominion. The first step of any consequence was the restoration of the order of the Jesuits, which took place, I think, in 1815. These are the sworn propagators of the faith of Rome, and of the authority of the Pope, in all parts of the world; and about two years ago, I observed in the Orthodox Journal, a work avowedly in the interest of the Jesuits, that the society either had made, or were about to make a settlement in the United States of America. Add to this the information of Mr Morrissy, contained in my last Number, that the Pope had lately sent an acquaintance of his, from Ireland, to establish the Inquisition in the United States; referring, I have no doubt, to the new bishop of Charleston, who was consecrated at Cork about a year ago.

Now, the Jesuits are men of talents, learning, and intrigue. They know how to make their religion appear respectable in the eyes of worldly men. They will soon throw into the shade such dignitaries as his lordship of Philadelphia, or get them promoted to other sees, where their ignorance will not be so manifest; for as the Pope has men for all sorts of places, so he has places for all sorts of men. Upon the whole, there is reason to expect, that the Church of Rome will soon appear in great splendour in the western world. The bishop of Charleston has made his debut as a preacher with great eclat; and his church is well attended, even by Protestants, who are attracted by the pomp of the service and the brilliancy of his eloquence.

If it be true, as I fear it is, that infidelity is very prevalent in the American States, there is the more reason to apprehend the increase of Popery. Infidelity is a heartless, comfortless system: it will never do to die with. There are certain fearful forebodings of a judgment to come, from which the most hardened infidel is not altogether exempted. While he rejects the sovereign, certain remedy, which the gospel reveals, he will readily take up with such a counterfeit of it, as will afford him peace of mind without requiring him to relinquish any of his evil propensities. Popery is such a counterfeit of Christianity, as it has been my design to show throughout my work. The state into which it puts a man, in reference to the future judgment, is not a whit better than that in which infidelity leaves him; but he has present peace of mind in believing a lie; and this is inducement enough for multitudes to become Papists. It is most undoubtedly a lie which the priest tells the miserable sinner, when he assures him, that by baptism he can regenerate him, or that by penance he can absolve him from his sins, or that by any means a sinner can be saved without faith in Christ, and the actual, not the mere proposed forsaking of his sins; for without holiness no man shall see the Lord; but those who will not forsake their sins in this world, yet wish to escape hell in the next, are, in righteous judgment, abandoned to believe this lie as a truth, and are deceived to their eternal ruin.

The prevalence of ignorance over very extensive districts of the western continent also gives reason to expect the increase of Popery there. This remark does not apply to the eastern, or New England States; but chiefly to the immense territory of Virginia and southwards. In the interior of these States, there are few places for Christian worship, and few to dispense Christian ordinances; and there can be nothing more true than what Dr Chalmers has been labouring to inculcate, that Christian instruction is not one of those things for which there is a natural demand. A knowledge of Christianity is essentially necessary to the desire of enjoying any of its ministrations, or partaking of any of its benefits. Those who possess the gospel ought therefore to carry it to those who have it not, without waiting for a demand; but this has not been done to any great extent, nor is there any appearance of its being done, in the interior of the above territory. The people, therefore, will fall an easy prey to swarms of artful priests, who will soon be sent among them, now since the Jesuits have taken the work in hand. We know what has taken place in this respect, in some of the large Highland parishes, where there has always been some sort of Protestant ministry. How much more may it not be expected in those districts of America, where thousands and tens of thousands are growing up to manhood, without ever having heard a gospel sermon, or witnessed a Christian baptism? In short, unless the real Protestants of America bestir themselves, and undertake the work of evangelizing their countrymen, with the zeal and fidelity of apostles and evangelists, the Pope will get the better of them; and a thick darkness will settle down upon their country, like that which enveloped Europe for a thousand years.

It is not necessary to suppose Popery to have arrived at this state of advancement, in order to perceive its probable influence upon the political institutions of America. When the Jesuits have got the education of youth, were it only the youth of their own communion, into their hands, they will soon make learned and accomplished politicians and statesmen. The road to honour and power lies open before them. They will soon get into both branches of the legislature; and there is nothing to prevent a Papist from being President; and it is possible that persons lately come into the world may live to see this. Popery is essentially and incurably an arbitrary, slavish, and intolerant system; and where it possesses power, it will establish itself to the exclusion of every other. The Americans will find it so, when they have a sufficient number of Papists in Congress, or in the executive of their government; and then they will be able to judge whether or not their fathers acted wisely in leaving the door open to them.

I know that by making this suggestion, I shall incur the charge of intolerance, and what not—but this gives me no concern, seeing the accusation proceeds from a mistake. I do not think the Americans were called upon, when framing their constitution, to ordain any restrictions with regard to liberty of worship; but I think they might have ordained that no man should hold an office of power and authority in their republic, who owed spiritual or temporal allegiance to a foreign power. This would have shut out Papists, without so much as naming Popery; and it would have been doing no more than what every state has a right to do, and ought to do, if it pays any regard to its own preservation.

I take it for granted that spiritual subjection to a fellow-creature necessarily implies temporal subjection; and I defy all the world to show the contrary. Now the Pope has actually begun to exercise spiritual supremacy in the United States. By his own sole authority, he detaches the two Carolinas and Georgia from the see of Baltimore, and he gives these States to Dr England, late of Cork, to be subject to him in all things spiritual, as he is subject to the Pope himself. It is certified that this Dr England has taken the oath of fealty to the Pope, which, as I showed in a late Number, is also an oath to persecute and fight against all heretics:—and does any man imagine, that when the question shall come to be, whether he, or such as he, shall be loyal to the Pope or to the President, the latter will have any chance of such a one standing by him, or by the free constitution of the United States? If the Americans were wise, they would keep a watchful eye over those divisions of their territory, for the purpose of spiritual jurisdiction; for they may depend upon it, that temporal jurisdiction is intended to follow, and will follow by degrees; for no Papist will refuse to apply all the strength of his body to effect what his priest tells him is for the good of his soul.

I have mentioned, on the authority of Mr Morrissy, that a priest has lately gone from Ireland to establish the inquisition in the United States; and this will no doubt be scouted at as the most chimerical thing in the world. What! the inquisition! the Americans will never submit to that! Nay, but they have submitted to it already; and they will do so again. The inquisition consists of a thousand degrees of atrocity, from the pious confessional, to the rack, and the "dry pan," in which the bodies of heretics are burnt over a slow fire. In auricular confession, every priest is an inquisitor. He inquires into the most secret thoughts of those who acknowledge his ghostly authority. He becomes acquainted with all their faults and with all their crimes, if they have been so unhappy as to make themselves criminal even in thought. Then he obtains absolute authority over them, and makes them do whatever he pleases; and they dare not disobey him, for he knows their crimes, and may divulge them. An engine is thus put into the hand of every priest, which, with a little address, he may make use of to subvert the best civil government in the world, if those who submit their consciences to him have any place in such government. And therefore it is that I maintain, that a Papist cannot be safely intrusted with power, over any but persons of his own communion; and even over them he must be an arbitrary governor if it be the will of his priest that he should be so.

The following is not very intimately connected with the subject of my late Numbers; but it has been lying some time by me, and I do not know when I may have a better opportunity of bringing it in. It is part of a serious religious letter, from a Papist, in a remote part of the Highlands, to his son in Glasgow. I have the names of both father and son, as well as the place of residence of the former, in the Highlands, and of the latter, in Glasgow; but I shall suppress these, as it is not my intention to expose private family matters, but merely to exhibit the character of Popery, and the spirit of its adherents. The letter is dated 16th July, 1819; and the following is the extract:—

"As you apprehend the danger you are in among heretics, desiring me to pray for you, I always remember you in my prayer. Heretics and wicked men are permitted by God to live on in their wicked ways, for some time, as he sees proper; but the justice of God will overtake them at last, so that I would not choose to live amongst them. It is for the things of this world, and the body, you stay among them; as the gospel says, 'what will it avail a man to gain the whole world and lose his own soul?' Many kingdoms and states rose up and stood against the Catholic Church, since the time of the apostles; but none of them had the promise of Jesus Christ to last long, but his Catholic Church. There was never an empire, kingdom, or commonwealth, that stood for eighteen hundred and nineteen years, but her; and we are sure of that government to remain to the end of the world. All the rest had their period; and their particular judgment came upon them in their places, one by one as church history informs me. This poor kingdom has been corrupted by heresy for the space of near three hundred years, especially the low country; and that period will be at an end within two years after this; and whatever judgment as God sees proper may happen, every pious Catholic ought to choose for himself the place where the Catholic faith ever stood, and is still, rather than be among them; that is my advice to you; and keep this letter to yourself."

It is very evident that this letter proceeds from the mind of a man who is seriously religious in his own way, and anxious about the spiritual welfare of his son, which he considers to be exposed to as much danger among heretics in Glasgow, as that of Lot was among the men of Sodom. This ought to let us, Protestants, know in what light we are regarded by our Popish neighbours. Those from the Highlands, as well as those from Ireland, come and settle among us, with the design of earning their bread by the employment which we furnish them; but all the while they look upon us as a proscribed race, and doomed to destruction, because we are heretics; and they think, with complacency, of the near approach of that destruction, which they consider the same thing as their own emancipation.

This remark is suggested by the prophecy contained in the above extract. The letter was written in July, 1819, and it is predicted, that in two years from that date the Protestant religion in this country will be overthrown. It is well known that in 1819, the system of radicalism came to its height, or perfection of organization; and that travelling chapmen, and all sorts of low itinerants, carried the report through the remotest parts of the country, that there was to be a radical change in the government of the kingdom; and that Glasgow was to be the centre of the enterprise; and by such simpletons as the writer of this letter, the subversion of the established government was considered the same thing as the restoration of the true religion, which had been suppressed for three hundred years. The father did not wish his son to have any hand in the intended rebellion, as is evident from the mysterious manner in which he advises him to leave Glasgow, lest he should be involved in it; but it is equally evident that any thing that would bring about a restoration of Popery, in two years, would be hailed by the writer as a joyful event; and I put it to every Papist in the kingdom to say, if he would not think it so. And though they are not aware of it, and will not believe it, our Papists, by desiring such a change, are desiring their own destruction; for as matters are at present, they enjoy the privileges of British subjects, and may resist even the impositions of their priests if they please; but supposing them to have obtained the desired revolution, and the establishment of their own religion, they would loose the benefit of that protection which the law as it stands affords them; they would fall under the arbitrary dominion of their priests, and become as great slaves in Britain as Christians are in Algiers.

No. CLXXVI.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 24TH, 1821.

I have finished what I had to say on the subject of admitting Papists to places of power in this Protestant kingdom, and should now proceed to what I formerly promised, namely, a reply to Dr Milner's "End of Religious Controversy." But a subject of more immediate interest to myself, and the work in which I am engaged, will demand my attention for a week or two. My reply to Dr Milner is, indeed, a matter of less importance, seeing he has lately received a very able answer, by the Rev. Richard Grier, a clergyman of the established church in Ireland. This work is yet little known; none of the Reviews having noticed it, so far as I have seen; but, when it shall become known, I have no doubt of its obtaining very extensive circulation. Mr Grier is a thousand times better acquainted with the ancient fathers, both Greek and Latin, as well as with the fathers of the Reformation, than I can pretend to be; and, therefore, far more able to detect the impositions of the vicar apostolic of the midland district; and many a barefaced imposition he has detected. When I come to grapple with the said apostolic vicar, I shall keep on the ground of scripture and common sense, and refer him to Mr Grier for tradition and the fathers; and I suspect it will be a long time before his right reverence will venture to meet Mr Grier on the one ground, or The Protestant on the other. I must not be understood to insinuate that Mr Grier does not occupy the former ground as well as The Protestant; but merely that it is chiefly on the latter that he has the advantage of him.

The thing which demands my more immediate attention is, the Report of the Jury Trial of the cause between Mr Scott and THE PROTESTANT, which is just published,—nearly five months after the trial took place; and now it appears under this great disadvantage, that the public have forgotten the question, to which they were most feelingly alive at the time. While thus expressing the great disappointment, and the loss occasioned by the unreasonable delay of my reporter, justice requires me to say, that the Report itself is given with great accuracy, so far as my own recollection enables me to judge; and I appeal to the recollection of others who were present at the trial, whether it be not so. For the reason given in a former Number, (161,) the reporter was not able to finish it, or to give any part of the evidence in defence; but it is presumed, that there is enough given from other sources to enable the intelligent and impartial reader to form his own judgment as to the merits of the question.

The Issues and preliminary matter occupy the first eleven pages of the publication. In the twelfth page, Mr Cockburn begins to open the case for the pursuer; and a very strong and plain case he seems to make of it; namely, that Mr Scott is a very meritorious individual, who comes into court with clean hands; and that Mr M'Gavin is one of the greatest libellers on the face of the earth. Many bad things he lays to the charge of Mr M'Gavin, which he does not even attempt to prove; and which it is not necessary, perhaps, that he himself should believe. A thing may be true in fact, yet it will be held false in law, if not proved in court; so there are many things at least doubtful, which an advocate may argue upon for hours, as if they were true, without transgressing the law. I do not wish to be understood as intending the least reflection against Mr Cockburn. He had a duty to perform to his client, which he did with great ability and fidelity; and in the severest passages, his language is such as became a gentleman to speak, and as was fit for gentlemen to hear, which I mention merely for the sake of a subsequent contrast. After all, it is not properly with Mr Cockburn that I have to do, in reviewing this Report of the Trial. He was merely the official organ of Mr Scott, from whom he must have received those things which he gave as facts, and some of the things which he meant to pass for arguments. I mean, therefore, no reflection against the bar, much less against the court or the jury, in any thing that I am going to write; but I consider a published account of a public trial, as fair a subject of review as any other publication; and though the issue of this trial was against me, and though the damages found had been ten times more than they were, I would not think it right or lawful to say a word in disparagement of the civil institutions of my country, or that had the least tendency to bring the law into contempt.

But with the most cordial respect for our civil institutions, and a conscientious subjection to the law, I hope I shall not be found a transgressor by exposing some of the sophistry and misrepresentation that my pursuer appears to have put into the mouth of his counsel. Some of the things are most powerfully exposed by Mr Moncreiff, in his speech in the defence: but that speech being necessarily extempore, so far as regarded replies, it was not possible to attend to every minute particular that is asserted on the other side; and some things are slightly touched, which admit of a more detailed discussion.

The reader of the Report will see that in strong language, Mr M'Gavin is accused of malignity towards the pursuer, to whom his writings have been so extremely injurious, that "it would be very odd, indeed, that, after such writing, Mr Scott's character should be as it was," and that "every farthing given of the damages asked, could not restore Mr Scott to the respectability and comfort he enjoyed before," p. 44. Again, "The work itself, by Mr M'Gavin, was hung up on the statue of King William, for the sake of being read by the mob in the street; and the effect of all this was, that Mr Scott was, in many cases, made the victim of popular commotion," p. 42. Not a word of this is proved, or attempted to be proved. I suppose it is usual in actions of damages, for the pursuer to prove that he has sustained injury of some kind or other: but here there is nothing of the kind, as the reader may see by reading over the depositions of Mr Scott's witnesses; and surely had Mr Scott been the victim of popular commotion—had he received a single public insult, nothing could be easier than to prove the fact. But not a word is said by any of his witnesses on that point. Neither is it proved, or attempted to be proved, that Mr Scott's character is not what it was; or that he does not now enjoy the respectability and comfort which he enjoyed before. These also are things capable of proof, and no doubt would have been proved had the allegation been true, which it is not. The statements of The Protestant could not affect his respectability among his own people, if they knew them to be false; and if he knew of any other persons who had conceived a bad opinion of him from these statements, he might have brought such persons to prove the fact. One respectable witness deponing to this would have had more weight with the jury than all Mr Cockburn's unsupported assertions; and would have procured him more ample damages. And I agree with the learned gentleman in his conclusion, had he proved his premises; that is, had he proved that Mr Scott had sustained such injury, as he says he did, in consequence of false and malignant statements in The Protestant, the whole £3000 of damages would not have been too much.

I said, Mr Scott did not even attempt to prove that he had sustained injury of any kind; but I must give this with some explanation; for there was something like an attempt, in one or two instances; but such attempts, and such a sort of proof, were never heard of before in any court in the world. Mr Gordon, the Popish priest in Greenock, was brought to prove that he had been insulted in Greenock, from the impression which the Protestant had made upon the good people of that town; and the jury were asked to consider this as evidence of what Mr Scott must have suffered in Glasgow! I question if Mr Cockburn will be able to keep his gravity when he reads the account of the hand he had in leading this sort of evidence. For the reader's satisfaction, I shall quote the passage in connection with part of Mr Cockburn's speech:—

"In the town of Greenock," said Mr C. "there was a dissenter, who, instead of making the scriptures the subject of his sermon, actually gave his hearers a lecture from The Protestant, insomuch that the Catholic clergyman there was obliged to apply to the magistrates for assistance," p. 42. Then turn to the examination of the Rev. Mr Gordon, p. 74.

"Q. Had this work (The Protestant) a considerable circulation about Greenock? Was it publicly commented on?—A. I understood it was, in a meeting-house.

"Q. Whose meeting-house?—A. The Rev. Mr Wilson's.

"Q. Were ever any particular words put upon your own chapel?—A. Yes.

"What were they?—A. 'Down with Popery' or 'Black Popery'—I do not remember which.

"Q. Was that during the time The Protestant was going on?—A. It was.

"Q. And was there ever any thing done to put down black Popery—or did the populace ever give any insults to you about that time?—A. They called after me 'Roman Catholic priest,'—I do not know if that is an insult or not.

"The Lord Chief Commissioner—Q. What is the meaning of all this?

"Mr Cockburn—We leave the jury to infer what effect this Protestant would have upon Mr Scott."

Now this is what I called something like an attempt to prove that Mr Scott had suffered injury from The Protestant; and I ask all the lawyers in the world, if ever they witnessed any thing like it? It is in fact a proof that Mr Scott never suffered insult or inconvenience from the cause assigned, else he would have got some direct proof of the fact, and would never have had recourse to such a desperate shift as to try to prove his sufferings from those of another man, in another town. In his cross-examination, Mr Gordon admitted that he had been called Roman priest before The Protestant began; and that this work only revived what had been done before: and why should he consider it an insult to be called by his real designation? He was called so, he says, at the time of building his own chapel; but I suppose he never thought of raising an action of damages against the builders on that account.

To that part of the question, whether any thing had been done in Greenock to put down black Popery, he gave no answer, from which we may infer that nothing was done; but Mr Cockburn tells us, that something was done to put down free discussion:—that this said priest applied to the magistrates of Greenock for assistance; that is, to compel the people who met in Mr Wilson's meeting-house to forbear reading the Protestant. This is a fact which I had heard before; but I did not expect that it would have been so explicitly avowed. This was a direct attempt by the Papists to commence persecution in a Protestant town. It is not true that The Protestant was made to supersede the bible, and preaching from it. The matter was simply this:—a number of Protestants, of various denominations, met once a week, on Thursday evening, to hear one of their number read The Protestant; and I have been told that great numbers attended, and that the interest excited was very great. Certainly there was nothing illegal in this—nothing that required magisterial interference; and the magistrates had too much good sense, and knew their duty too well, to become the executioners of the holy inquisition, which thus appeared to be erected within their jurisdiction. Had any of the ministers of Greenock applied to the magistrates to prohibit Mr Gordon from preaching against the established religion, all the world would have heard of Protestant intolerance and persecution; but when a Popish priest does virtually the same thing, it is considered so much a thing of course, that no person wonders at it, or at all thinks about it. No doubt Mr Gordon was grieved by the exposure of the superstitons and idolatries of his church, which was made every week almost within his hearing; but he ought to have replied in the way of fair argument, and not by force, as is evident he would have done, had he had Popish magistrates who would have executed his mandate.

That some person did hang up some Numbers of my work on the railing of King William's statue, to be read by the public, is true; but I had no more hand in it than Mr Scott; nor do I know who did it; and that it was done by me, is one of those random assertions, which the learned gentleman chose to make, to serve the cause of his client; no matter how improbable, if it was likely to make an impression on the jury. But whoever was guilty of giving my work such publicity, it is very certain that it did Mr Scott no injury,—it excited no commotion, else we should have heard of it, and Mr Scott would have proved it.

Another circumstance is brought into view, as an attempt to prove the injury which The Protestant has done to Mr Scott; that is, the great diminution of the number of his members. This was not pleaded by his counsel; and none of his witnesses were examined as to the number of conversions from Popery by means of my writings; but some papers were given in, and sworn to by the witness Bowman, which are printed, pp. 60, 61. of the Trial, by which it appears, that the number is very much diminished indeed; and I cannot comprehend why these papers were given in, but to support the claim of heavy damages for the injury done by The Protestant in causing such diminution. In March, 1817, the year before my work commenced, the total number on the books was 4517
Total number in December, 1820 . 3957

Decrease of members . . . 560

At the first mentioned period, the number of subscribers to the chapel was .	4037
At the second period, the number was	2696
Decrease of subscribers . . .	1341

Allowing these to be facts, and I have no means of disproving them, it was not an injury done to Mr Scott by illegal means, and therefore not such as to found a claim for damages. It is the result of argument on the one hand, and conviction on the other. If an action of damages can be maintained on this ground, Mr Scott ought to be libelled for every convert he has made from the established church, if he ever made such a thing, which I much doubt.

He will argue that I made his people disaffected by means of false statements, and that therefore they left him; but if the people knew my statements to be false, and none could know the state of facts so well as they, that would have endeared them to their pastor the more. If they left him in consequence of my statements, it must have been because they knew them to be true; for it would be almost as absurd as transubstantiation, to say, that they disbelieved my statements, or knew them to be false, and yet were influenced by the belief of them to forsake their priest, and abandon their religion.

But admitting the facts in all their extent, Mr Scott is no way injured by them. If his flock is less numerous, his work is less arduous; and bishop Cameron proved it to be a very arduous work indeed,—a work for which no other priest within his jurisdiction was competent. If the subscriptions be also diminished, that is no pecuniary loss to Mr Scott; for bishop Cameron proved likewise, that he had no patrimonial interest whatever in the property, and his stipend remains undiminished.

Of the 560 members whom he has lost, he has not said how many were lost by reading The Protestant, and how many by leaving the place from want of employment, during the stagnation of trade, in 1819-20. Much as it would gratify me to have the former proved to be the chief cause, a regard to truth compels me to say, that I believe, at least in the proportion of ten to one, the defection was owing to the latter cause. With regard to them, therefore, the falling off was owing to no fault of mine, and it could not be for that that damages were awarded. Nay, I have in my possession the names of upwards of fifty Popish families,* making about 250 individuals, whom I assisted to feed and clothe, by means of a public subscription, during the above period of stagnation, and thus kept them in the place, when, otherwise, they must have left it, or died of want. I hope Mr Scott will not say I must pay damages for this.

Of the 1341 who have ceased to subscribe for paying the debt upon the chapel, or the manse, or both, he does not say how many were influenced to withdraw their names by reading The Protestant. From any thing that appears, the defalcation may be entirely owing to their not being so strictly looked after, or so strongly urged to subscribe, as they were before The Protestant took up the subject. The time of subscribing according to the statements above referred to, divides itself into two periods of about $3\frac{1}{2}$ years each. During the first period, the sum raised, among the labouring classes, in sixpences, shillings &c. was £5487 9*s.* 9*d.*, and in the latter period, only £687 18*s.* 3*d.* Report, pp. 60, 61. Was this defalcation owing to The Protestant? If not, I ask, why was such a statement given in evidence against him; and if it was owing to his writings, the people must have known there was truth in his statements.

Here is a case of Mr Scott's own showing, and I ask him to explain it. From August, 1813, to March, 1817, that is, 43 months, the poor and labouring part of his congregation contributed for the chapel £5487 9*s.* 9*d.* This is exclusive of large sums from the rich, which are stated separately at £426 3*s.* which includes Mr Finlay's 50 guineas, and sums from several other of my Protestant acquaintances, whom I need not name, as Mr Cockburn boasts of none of them by name but Mr Finlay. Well, in the first period, or 43 months, the poor labouring people contribute £5487 9*s.* 9*d.*, and in the second period, from March, 1817, to December, 1820, that is, 45 months, the very same class of people contribute only £687 18*s.* 3*d.*

This, I say, is according to Mr Scott's own showing; and I call upon him to account for the difference of his levies in these two periods. That I may not assert what may be called libellous, I shall merely ask him a pair of questions, on which I really wish to obtain information. First; Was not the sum levied in the first period, done by means of that influence by which a Popish priest can make his people do whatever he pleases, that is, not without the range of physical impossibility? And, secondly; Was not the small sum collected during the second period, just that which the people chose to give of their own free will, without recourse being had to that influence which is mentioned in the other question? An answer to these two questions will enable us to judge how far the first contributions were really voluntary; and as the latter period was distinguished by the lucubrations of The Protestant, we shall, perhaps, be enabled to determine, whether there has been any connection between these lucubrations, and the falling off of the subscriptions. I maintain that though the one were proved to have been occasioned by the other, there could be no fault found, seeing no means but argument were used, to convince poor persons, that it was better to study the health and comfort of their families, than to give their money for raising a great heap of stones cut into fantastic figures, "whose likeness is not seen in heaven, or earth, or sea."

* One of these was that of the celebrated John Drain, who makes a conspicuous figure in the trial. The following is the statement given by himself, when he applied for relief at Hutcheson's Hospital. "Name, John Drain—place of abode, M'Kinlay's land, east end of Duke Street—residence, within the royalty, five years—age, 27,—wife's, 23—children under 10 years, 2—occupation, weaver—earnings, himself 4*s.* his wife, 9*d.* per week;"—and the following is a certificate by the gentleman appointed by the committee to visit him in his own house, which was usually done to applicants before relief was granted. "This statement (the above) is correct. This is a case of great poverty, arising from his bad state of health, and the lowness of his wages for a long time past. They are destitute of bed-clothing, and almost so of body clothes. These articles they are in real want of; and the prospect of an addition to his family very soon, would render them doubly acceptable. He bears an honest and industrious character. 6th Jany. 1820." Relief granted, a pair and a half of blankets, and a supply of meal weekly, till the month of May, 15 pecks in all. It is to be regretted his character did not stand so fair, when he appeared as a witness in my cause, to prove that Mr Scott, eighteen months before, had refused to baptize his apparently dying child, unless he would pay 10*s.* to the chapel. The character must however have been given according to the knowledge of his neighbours at the time.

If it shall be alleged that the small sum collected during the second period was owing to the stagnation of trade, on account of which Mr Scott did not urge his people to contribute; I shall answer, that the greatest stagnation and distress known in the present age was during the first period, when the large sum was collected, to wit, 1816, and the beginning of 1817; for then there was a dearth of provisions as well as want of employment for the poor. I am in possession of the committee's books for both periods, and I speak what I know; and what is known to all who took charge of supplying the wants of the poor in these seasons of great distress.

No. CLXXVII.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 1ST 1821.

THE reader will see by my last Number, that Mr Scott did not prove that he had suffered any injury from the statements in The Protestant. For the truth of this I appealed to the testimony of his own witnesses, in the Report of the Trial, not one of whom speaks of injury having been done to the character or interest of the pursuer. Some statements, in their opinion, may have been injurious; but they do not prove the fact that they were so, in any respect whatever. From certain productions, it was proved indeed, that the number of his congregation was greatly reduced of late, that the number of subscribers for his house and chapel was still more reduced; and that those who continued to subscribe were not so liberal as before, seeing that in a recent period of 45 months they had contributed only £687 18*s.* 3*d.*, whereas in an immediately preceding period of 43 months they had contributed the large sum of £5487 9*s.* 9*d.*, exclusive of certain subscriptions from wealthy Protestants and others. I have called upon Mr Scott to account for the astonishing difference between the sums collected in these two periods; and, I am sure, account for it as he will, he cannot ascribe it to any thing very culpable on my part, seeing if the people withheld their money in consequence of my arguments, it must have been from a conviction in their own minds that they could apply it to a better purpose; and every one has a right to do what he will with his own. It could not be for this, or for injury done in any way to Mr Scott, that damages were awarded. I admit, that where malice and falsehood appear, they ought to be punished whether they have been injurious or not; but I was not proved guilty of these, else doubtless the damages would have been much greater.

I shall now proceed with my review of the Report of the Trial, and I shall dispose of the calculation part of it before I attend to any other. By a certain arithmetical process, (I shall not call it deception) Mr Cockburn finds that the total amount levied by Mr Scott from all his people, was, upon an average, only a penny three farthings a week; and by deducting the subscriptions above £10, the remainder was scarcely a penny a week; then, on the suggestion of Lord Gillies, this is reduced to a half-penny a week, which suggestion was perhaps correct, according to the data laid down, for which Mr Scott and his counsel alone were accountable. There was however a fundamental error in the data, which could not easily be detected, without a process of calculation which it was impossible to work and at the same time attend to the business of the court. So, taking his data as undisputed, Mr Cockburn goes on to say:—"Observe that plain and glaring fact. Allowing Mr Scott to have run riot in Glasgow, like a lion seeking whom he might devour, and devouring all who came in his way,—of great influence over his flock,—the calumny amounts to this, that for building a chapel necessary for his flock, the amount of the extortion was a half-penny a week." p. 34. The reply of the defender's counsel to this statement was necessarily general, (see p. 128.) for there was no time to go into the minute calculation which the subject required; and I have no doubt this confident statement of Mr Cockburn, suggested by one of the judges, and apparently resting upon an arithmetical fact, had more weight with the jury than any thing else that was said or proved.

It is admitted by Mr Cockburn, in his speech, that the expense of the chapel and manse was from fifteen to twenty thousand pounds, which agrees with the statement in The Protestant, where it is said to be nearly twenty thousand. Take it at the medium between fifteen and twenty, and we have £17,500; but the learned counsel makes his calculations upon only £5487. There is the sum of £12,000 altogether unaccounted for. There is not so much as an attempt to account for it, either by word or writing. Speaking of the large sum from £15,000 to 20,000, Mr Cockburn says, "that was not all from Glasgow," leaving it to be inferred that it was got somewhere. For the satisfaction of the court and jury they should have shown where they got so large a sum; or if it remains a debt on the property they should have said so. It is, however, not credible that so large a debt should lie upon it, or that any person would accept the security for so much. The necessary inference is, that by fees of confession, and other means, the poor people had to pay a great deal more than what appears in the subscription books.

But it is from these books that we must make our calculations, for we have no other data. Mr Cockburn states the number of Papists in and about Glasgow to have been, at the time of the subscription, meaning I suppose the first period, at 8245, which is the number according to Mr Cleland's tables. Then he tells us, they are now between nine and ten thousand, which is not very consistent with the statement of their decrease, as deponed by one of the witnesses. Whether he divides the product by one or other of the numbers to make out the half-penny a-week, it is needless to inquire, seeing the lowest number contains all the souls of that communion, men, women, and children, in the city and neighbourhood, according to a very accurate survey. Of these not above one fourth could be subscribers at any one time, according to the average of poor Irish families, in which there are usually a great many children. This plain fact raises Mr Cockburn's half-penny to twopence a-week, to every head of a family without exception; and though this will appear a small matter to learned gentlemen who are making their thousands a year, it must have been a very great matter to a poor labourer, and to his hungry children, at a time when provisions were nearly double the price that they are at present, and when he could not find employment for half his time.

But Mr Scott himself, by the hands of Mr Jeffrey, produces a statement to the accuracy of which Mr Bowman depones, by which it appears that during the 43 months, from August, 1813, to March, 1817, the total number of subscribers was only 4037. Observe, these were not all subscribers at any one time. They are all who gave any thing during the whole 43 months. A stranger, staying only a week in the place, and giving a sixpence, or other small sum, is marked down as a subscriber; and his name counts as well as that of the man who paid sixpence a-week during the whole period. The number 4037 is made up by reckoning many such. These, and their small sums, ought to be deducted, and then, by dividing the sum that remains among the remaining persons, we shall see what the regular subscribers paid upon an average.

The paper referred to states, that 1049 persons gave under five shillings; and that 597 gave under ten shillings but above five. These must all have been persons who staid only a short time in the place, or persons who had died, or had recently come to reside among us. Be what they may, they cannot be called regular subscribers. They must therefore be deducted from the 4037, and the average of their payments from the aggregate amount. Thus, take 1049 at 2*s*. 6*d*. which is the medium between 5*s*. and nothing, and we have	£131	2	6

597 at 7*s*. 6*d*. the medium between 10*s*. and 5*s*. . .	223	17	6
	£355	0	0

This sum, therefore, falls to be deducted from the £5487, which leaves, nett, £5132. Mr Cockburn consented to deduct those who paid above £10; but I will concede to him all above £7, considering these above the rank of poor persons. These are 72, (see p. 60,) and this will exhaust a little more than the £426 3*s*., which is given as the amount of the large sums. Then deduct 1049 + 597 + 72 = 1718, from 4037, and we have 2319 persons. Among them divide £5132, and we have exactly £2 4*s*. 3*d*., from each individual for 43 months, being a fraction more than a shilling a month or sixpence a fortnight. This result corresponds with the real fact of the case, for which I appeal to Mr Scott's own books, in the columns of which 6*d*. a fortnight will be found the prevailing rate of contribution. There are of course some more and some less; but the thousands of sixpences in the books of his inventory, No. I. prove the correctness of my calculation.

Thus the court and the jury were led by Mr Scott and his counsel, by a calculation proceeding upon a false datum, to believe that the sum exacted from poor people was only a sixth part of what it really was. Had the books themselves been submitted to the inspection of the jury when they retired, they would have seen the real state of the matter. They would have seen lists of names such as they never saw before,—M'Gurks, and M'Guires, and M'Deads and M'Deaths, and O'Rourks, and O'Flannahans, O'Regans, Gallochars, and such like, mostly poor Irish labourers, with lines of sixpences opposite their names, like the notes in a music book; and they would at once have detected the halfpenny a week sophistry; but somehow the jury were not directed to take the books with them when they retired; and they saw them merely as a heap, lying on a table at a distance.

By Mr Scott's own productions, and the deposition of one of his witnesses, it is thus proved, that 2319 Papists in Glasgow and the neighbourhood, during a period of 43 months, were contributing towards the building of the chapel, threepence a week, upon an average, that is, a halfpenny a day; and it is well known that during at least a part of that period few labourers of any description, with the exception of cotton-spinners, were able to procure food for their families, or clothes to cover them. I appeal for the truth of this, to all the elders, and others, who have paid any attention to the state of the poor in this city, and in the Barony parish of late years; and I ask such persons to say, whether, in their opinion, it was possible, that such a number of labourers, in such a season of distress, could pay a halfpenny a day, without denying their children or themselves some of the necessaries of life, or being indebted for them to the bounty of others?

The commissioners of police, and the managers of the water companies, know how difficult it is, nay that it is impossible, in hundreds of instances, to obtain payment of their assessments and rates, though as low as twentypence a year, even from persons not as poor as Irish labourers, but from persons whose yearly rent amounts to £5, and who are therefore in a more respectable situation than those who cannot afford to have houses of their own, but are huddled together in crowds, in hired apartments, as is the case with multitudes of Irish labourers. To such persons a halfpenny a day or thirteen shillings a year, must have been a grievous burden. Persons wallowing in wealth will not understand this; but the poor themselves, and those who have had the charge of supplying the poor, will understand it.

Mr Jeffrey, it will be seen, in the short sketch of his speech that is given at the end of the Report, enlarged on the monstrous statement of The Protestant, of nearly £20,000 having been levied from the poor people, when it turned out in evidence that the sum so levied was under £6000. So far as recollection serves, this was the most argumentative part of his speech, and he made as much, I believe, as human ingenuity could make of the discrepancy between the statement, and the arithmetical fact, as it appeared in the evidence. I shall reply to this when he, or Mr Scott, shall have accounted for the £12,000 that remains unaccounted for, according to Mr Scott's own showing, by the mouth of Mr Cockburn. The remarks of The Protestant in his seventy-second Number, proceeded upon the general report and belief, that two such buildings as the chapel and the manse must have cost nearly £20,000, and that they were built chiefly at the expense of the labouring poor of his congregation. Mr Scott, by his counsel, admits the fact, that the buildings cost as much as The Protestant said, but he accounts for only one-third of the money raised for these buildings. His subscription books, therefore, do not give a full statement of the sums levied for the chapel. There must have been other sources of supply which are kept out of view, else there remains a debt upon the property of more than it is worth, which was not pleaded or pretended in the process.

I am willing, however, to admit the existence of some debt upon the property, because bishop Cameron speaks of Mr Scott's having proposed to let his fine house, and go to a smaller one, that the rent of the large one might go towards the payment of the debt. But this would be a most absurd idea, if the debt were £12,000; for the rent of the house, together with the total contributions of all the people, since March, 1817, would not pay the interest of the debt; so they would find themselves like a lame man pursuing a hare, the longer he ran he would be the farther from his object. If the debt in March, 1817, was £12,000, it must have been at the end of 1820 at least £14,000, and all the money collected for the liquidation of it, down to that period, was only £687 18*s.* 3*d.*, acording to Mr Scott's own productions. Now, I say, this is altogether incredible. It is improbable, I may say impossible, that the property can bear such a burden; and, therefore, there is every reason to believe he must have raised among his people much more money than that which appears in his subscription books; and whatever was so raised, ought to be added to the sixpence a fortnight already proved to have been the average rate of contribution from his subscribers.

Here I am arguing from a public statement made by Mr Scott's counsel, and public documents exhibited by himself in open court. The sum of the matter is this:—his chapel and manse cost £17,500; all that he collected for it from his people and others was about £6000, leaving about £12,000 unaccounted for. He ought to have accounted for this one way or other; and if he had received large subscriptions from his brethren at a distance, he would have had no reasonable objection to show them, because they could have shown the interest which these brethren took in his great undertaking; but as nothing of the kind was shown, it is reasonable to presume nothing of the kind could be shown.

We must have a more particular inquiry into this £687 18*s.* 3*d*, which has come so often in our way. This was all that Mr Scott was able to collect from his people from March, 1817, to December, 1820, that is, 45 months. The contributors were, as is stated, p. 61. of the Report, 2696. Of these 1625 paid under 5*s.* which, taken at half-a-crown as formerly, would make £203 2*s.* 6*d.*; 608 were above 5*s.* but under 10*s.* and taken as formerly at 7*s.* 6*d.* the sum is £228. These two sums = £431 2*s.* 6*d.*, taken from £687: 18*s.* 3*d.*, leave £256: 15*s.* 9*d.* Deduct 1625 + 608 = 2233, from 2696, and we have 463 persons who paid £256 15*s.* 9*d.*, in 45 months, making eleven shillings and one penny each, for the whole period; that is, about threepence a month. This comes nearer Mr Cockburn's halfpenny a week result; and it appears to have been the amount of the voluntary contribution, not of the thousands of poor, but of the four hundred and sixty-three rich, after The Protestant had opened their eyes, and shut their purses. The reader is again requested to observe, that I am arguing from Mr Scott's own statements; and if I am wrong in any of my inferences, he may set me right if he pleases.

Thus, though Mr Scott failed to prove that he had sustained any injury in his person or property, he does show that this Protestant has done immense mischief to the cause of Popery in this city and neighbourhood. But surely this will never be considered a crime by Protestants. It could not be for this that a Protestant jury ordained me to pay a hundred pounds of damages. The thing has been the effect of a fair literary warfare. Popery has ever been considered an enemy by consistent Protestants; and it has always been reckoned fair to cut off the supplies of an enemy when it can be done. I never intended injury to the person or property of Mr Scott or any other Papist; and it is gratifying to know that no such injury has been sustained by any man by what I have written; for it is doing Papists themselves no injury, but rather a benefit, to check the progress of their superstition, and to prevent their extending the reign of idolatry among us. That such a check has been given to Popery here, is fully proved by these statements of Mr Scott, especially when taken in connection with the deposition of bishop Cameron, who says, p. 46, that the house was built for the accommodation of two priests at least, because two are absolutely necessary, if they could be supported there; and in the same page, he says, that Mr Scott had applied to be removed to a smaller house, and to have the large one let, that the rent might go towards the payment of the debt. Thus what I stated more than three years ago, is proved to be true, by the bishop upon oath, that it was intended to have a college of priests in Glasgow, for whom this house was then building, and now it is further proved that the congregation cannot afford to support even one priest in the great house, with becoming splendour, but that he wishes to go to a small one. The design of having two priests at least, though declared absolutely necessary, has been abandoned in consequence of the drying up of their resources. Thus Popery has got a check here; and I would never have suspected that it was so much owing to my writings, if Mr Scott had not shown it.—When the design was formed the congregation were contributing in small sums, at the rate of £5487 in 43 months, or £127 a month; but lately they have contributed only £687 18*s.* 3*d.*, in 45 months, or £15 a month. Seeing they have been so powerfully affected by my writings in one way, I most earnestly entreat them to be affected in another way:—let them embrace the truth, renounce their errors, and abandon the Pope and Popery for ever. This will be infinitely more beneficial to them than the mere saving of their money, and I shall esteem it a much more glorious victory.

The achievement, such as it is, has been highly appreciated in the south, as appears by a late letter in the True Briton, London newspaper, signed ICONO-CLASTES, that is, image-breaker, of which the following is an extract:—"It will scarcely be credited that the inhabitants of Glasgow had so much forgotten the principles of their forefathers, that they flocked in crowds to this temple of the Christian Diana, and contributed liberally to the practice and encouragement of idolatry amongst them. Such latitudinarian indifference excited much regret among the sound part of the city, and at last, a respectable merchant, named M'Gavin, inserted a few letters in one of the Glasgow papers, under the signature of THE PROTESTANT. (It was A Protestant.) These were answered by Amicus Veritatis, Pax, &c. and the controversy continuing, Mr M'Gavin was induced to publish a weekly Number of eight pages, on the errors and absurdities of Popery. The effect has been beneficial beyond all hope. This recall to reflection has awakened in the inhabitants of that city a proper sense of their vacillating conduct on so important a subject; and their desertion of the Clyde Street Chapel has had a similar effect to that of the preaching of the apostle at Ephesus:—one of the priests, giving up all attempts of vindicating the worship of his imagery by the pen, determined to try what assistance the quirks and quibbles of the law would lend him." Then follow some remarks which must not appear in my pages.

People dwelling upon the spot will probably be of opinion that this writer overrates the good which my labours have done. I would think so myself, if Mr Scott had not shown that his supplics are so completely cut off, that instead of enlarging the establishment, and increasing the number of priests in order to propagate Popery among us, he is obliged to reduce the establishment,—to propose letting his dwelling-house, and going to a smaller one. Mr Jeffrey drew a most melancholy picture of a highly meritorious individual, living alone, in the corner of a great house, upon fifty pounds a year, which if it did not draw tears from the eyes of the judges and jury, was meant to draw money from my pocket. Though it had been for the sake of this passage alone, I wish the speech had been preserved; not merely because it was a piece of most pathetic eloquence; but because it showed how deeply he was affected by the magnitude of the mischief which I had done; which mischief, after all, is only the triumph of truth over error,—of common sense over absurdity and imposition.

No. CLXXVIII.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 8TH, 1821.

IT is a general belief among Protestants that miracles ceased with the apostolic age, or soon after it. Papists, on the other hand, maintain, that the church has had the power of working miracles in all ages; and Dr Milner, in his "End of Religious Controversy," relates several that have lately been performed at the holy well of St Wenefride, and one by the application of the hand of a dead saint to a diseased person in Lancashire. I was by no means convinced by the doctor's statements; and I might have continued all my days to disbelieve in Popish miracles, had not Mr Scott proved that he has performed one, to match which, he may boldly challenge all the saints in the calendar, and the holy well into the bargain.

This is no less than keeping a series of accounts, of many thousand pounds, collected in small sums, from thousands of persons, during a period of seven years, without having a date to ascertain when any particular sum was received; and keeping these accounts so correctly as to satisfy his bishop, who passed, and doqueted them, thus pledging his episcopal authority for their accuracy. I have past most of my life among books of accounts, and have been familiar with all sorts of book-keeping; and I am sure nothing less than a miracle would have kept my accounts right, if I had not been as particular in marking the dates of receiving and paying money, as in entering the money itself. But Mr Scott has proved the fact as above stated, by his own oath, and that of bishop Cameron, so that no one can lawfully doubt it; and I candidly confess, I never saw a Popish miracle so well attested.

This is a thing of so much importance, and so singularly miraculous, that I hope the reader will thank me for a more particular account of it. I shall introduce it with an extract from Mr Cockburn's speech:—"Under the forms of pleading in this court, as I am sure will be shown to you from the proper quarter at the proper time, when a defender says he will prove his defence, he is bound to mention his statements as specifically as if he, in reference to these statements, were the pursuer. The court, therefore, called on Mr M'Gavin to say what were the facts he meant to prove. He gave in a very thick and formidable paper—a great number of statements, extended to a long period of time, which might have embraced half the town with the evidence. When he was required to state a little more specifically what he meant, so specifically as to be intelligible, and to give names, times, circumstances, he attempted to do so during a year; but the whole fabric crumbled from him inch by inch, till at last the charges resolved into the four last cases mentioned in the Issues before you," p. 30. This is not quite correct, for he offered evidence on widow Hanlin's case specifically, which was the third Issue; but he was not allowed to enter into it. By the by I am much obliged to Mr Cockburn for the statement here given, because it lets the public see that I had no want of materials for my defence, had the forms and rules of court allowed me to make use of them. Indeed nothing could exceed the zeal and industry of Mr Blair, my agent in Glasgow, who procured and arranged such a mass of materials, as must have surprised Mr Scott himself; and he would have been still more surprised had I been allowed to examine all my witnesses. But to use Mr Cockburn's expression, p. 32, I was "put to the wall by the court," by their requiring not merely the names of persons, but also the "times" and "circumstances" of incidents which had taken place years before. It was not enough that I offered to prove the refusal of ordinances to John or James, because they were behind in their contributions; but I was required to condescend upon the date and circumstances of each particular case. Now this was impossible with regard to most of the cases, from the long time that had elapsed,—from the removal of some persons, and the death of others; and Mr Scott had taken care not to institute his action till he knew that I would have these difficulties to contend with.

There seemed to be only one way by which I could ascertain the dates of particular incidents; that was, by access to Mr Scott's subscription books, by which, I supposed, it would appear when such and such persons paid up their arrears, and were admitted to their privileges. Application was therefore made for a diligence to recover these books, which was opposed by Mr Scott, and refused by the court, see Report of the Trial, p. 135, till after the Issues were fixed. Then indeed the diligence was granted, and the books recovered. They were delivered in three parcels with their respective inventories. No. I. contained 48 books: No. II. 38: No. III. I forget how many, but they were about 100 in all. Along with my agent and Mr Sym, I set first to the examination of No. I. and on turning over the 48 books of this inventory, we found that not one of them had a date, either at the beginning, middle, or end. They might all have been a hundred years old for any thing that appeared by them; except, indeed, the book kept by Mr Scott himself, which proves itself to belong to the present century, not by any date, but by containing the names of several of my Protestant friends whom I know to be alive, and who were liberal subscribers to the chapel. Inventory, No. II. were also without dates, except the first book, which had upon the corner of the cover, Sept. 12th, 1819, perhaps by accident. Those in the third inventory seemed to be duplicates. The whole were given up under oath in the following terms, see the Trial, p. 123. "At Glasgow, the 4th of June, 1821, appeared the pursuer, Andrew Scott, who, being solemnly sworn, ut supra, and interrogated and called upon to exhibit the lists of contributors, or accounts of contributions, towards the Roman Catholic chapel, lately erected in Glasgow, depones and exhibits the whole of the documents of the description called for, in his possession, as per inventories, Nos. I. II. III. marked by the deponent and commissioner, as relative hereto. Farther, depones, that the exhibits now made, as contained in three separate parcels, contain the lists and accounts of the whole contributions, towards the Roman Catholic establishment in Glasgow, made in Glasgow, or the adjacent counties, down to the present month."

It appeared to us that we could make nothing of a set of books that contained no dates; accordingly we applied for a supplementary diligence to make Mr Scott produce books or accounts with dates. We obtained this, and had him examined again, on the 15th of June, when he swore as follows, see the Trial, p. 124, —"That he is not in possession of any books or other documents, tending to instruct the dates of the contributions to the erection of the said chapel, having, when formerly examined as a haver, exhibited and produced the whole documents of the description called for, in his possession. That he is not aware that it is usual to affix particular dates to subscription papers, and he was not in the habit of marking the dates on the contribution papers, which he, from time to time, received from the different collectors. That the contributions were begun about the middle of August, 1813, as far as he remembers; and that the last were received about the end of December, 1816. And being specially called on to produce any cash book, or other book or writing, in which he marked the sums contained in the inventory, No. I. of the productions formerly made, or any part thereof, specifying dates in reference to the said contributions,—depones, that he is not possessed, and to the best of his knowledge, never was possessed of any books, or other documents, specifying the dates of the said contributions, farther than may appear from the productions formerly made, particularly, No. I. of inventory, No. I. of said productions." See the rest of the deposition in the Report of the Trial. The book here referred to, in inventory No. I., contained no date at all; and, therefore, Mr Scott depones, that he never kept any date of the money he thus received.

Let us see now how bishop Cameron proves the accuracy of these books; at least, that he was satisfied with them.

"Examined by Mr Jeffrey.—Q. Had you any duty to perform in auditing the accounts of the chapel?—A. I had a right, which I exercised for some years while the building was going on.

Q. Were you satisfied with the collection and distribution of the funds.—A. I was." P. 46.

"Cross-examined by Mr Moncreiff.—Q. You said, in regard of the accounts for the erection of the chapel, that you had a right to control the accounts, and did so for some period?—A. I did, for several years, see them.

Q. Were they sent to you?—A. No; I inspected them there, and put my name to them.

Q. What kind of accounts were they?—A. I do not understand the question.

Q. Was there a book of accounts?—A. There was.

Q. Did you put your name to that book?—A. I did, for some years.

Q. Did you put your name more than once?—A. I must have put my name two or three different years, or perhaps oftener. I do not recollect particularly.

Q. In this book, was an account kept of disbursements and receipts?—A. It was not kept in a commercial way. It showed what was spent, what was got in, and how it was got in,—what was borrowed, &c.

Q. Did it appear, from the book, at what time the sums were received and given out?—A. It must have appeared when they were given out. They did not come in regularly. When there was not money, there was a necessity to borrow.

Q. What like a book was it in appearance?—A. I cannot answer that question I do not recollect at all. It is some years since I was there; and, from age and infirmity, I cannot rely upon my memory so much as to describe it to you.

Q. When you put your name to this book, did you put any doquet upon it—did you write any thing?—A. I must certainly have done that—I must have given a declaration that I had examined the accounts, and that I approved of them. I do not recollect in what form this was done, but I must have done it.

Q. In whose possession was this book at the time you went over it?—A. In Mr Scott's." Report, &c. pp. 48, 49.

After reading the above documents, and the bishop's deposition, I hope none of my readers will call in question the reality of the miracle which I have described. Mr Scott swears distinctly, that, to the best of his knowledge, he never was possessed of any books or accounts, specifying the dates of contributions to his chapel. And bishop Cameron swears as distinctly that he must have given a declaration that he had examined these accounts, and had approved of them. When interrogated as to the dates of money received, he evades the question by a remark which in any case but a miraculous one, would have made dates particularly necessary; that is, the money did not come in regularly. Had it come in at regular periods, as Martinmas and Whitsunday, the lines would have indicated their own dates, supposing the first only to have been dated. But the very irregularity of the payments rendered the dates absolutely necessary to the accuracy of the accounts, had the case been an ordinary one, especially as the contributions received were mixed with borrowed money, and money belonging to other individuals, which Mr Scott was in the habit of receiving and putting into the bank according to the sequel of his second deposition, p. 125. This is a mere mercantile question about the accurate keeping of pounds, shillings, and pence; and I ask all the merchants and accountants in Glasgow, and many very acute and accurate men are among them, whether they do not feel as I do, that without a miracle they would find it impossible to keep distinct accounts of money transactions without dates? I am sure they will unanimously say they would find it impossible. They may be very sure then, that a Romish priest, who knows little more than the common rules of arithmetic, could not, without a very signal miracle, keep such accounts as he has done, without dates, so as to satisfy an ordinary auditor, much less his right reverend superior, the diocesan of the lowlands of Scotland.

The reader of the Report will see, pp. 59—61, that James Bowman depones to certain statements, which differ materially from both Mr Scott's depositions. The contributions are not made to come down to either December, 1816, or June 1821; but are divided into two periods from August, 1813, to March, 1817, and from the latter date, to December, 1820. Bowman swears that these are correct abstracts, and that he did his best to make them so; but he was under no supernatural influence. He possessed nothing but the ordinary arithmetical power of summing up, and extending by means of pen and ink; and as the materials from which he made up the statements were without any dates that could show when money was received, it would be unfair to place the result of his operations in competition with the other result so evidently miraculous.

The reader will perceive by this time, that the subscription books could be of little use to us. Having no dates themselves, they could not prove the date of any thing else. And though they had been dated; and though they had enabled us to fix the time of every fact we wished to prove, they would have been of no use, as we afterwards found, for the court would not allow us to prove any thing but what was contained in the last four of the seven Issues, which were fixed before we obtained the diligence to recover the books. In looking over the lists, however, Mr Sym discovered a great many names which were familiar to him as hospital paupers, who were considerable subscribers, two or three of whom were actually living in the hospital at the time. Whether these were all the same persons, or merely persons of the same name, I cannot say for certain. We meant to try to prove their identity, by Mr Buchanan, who visits all the hospital poor at their own houses, and for this purpose he had brought the hospital books; but the reader will see by the Trial, p. 135, that we were not allowed to get an answer to a single question about any person or fact but what related to one or other of the four Issues; and thus three-fourths of my witnesses were not examined at all. I merely state the fact, without any reflection whatever. There is no doubt a reason for the rule under which the court acted; and it may be a very equitable one; but I state the fact, as it is of great public importance; and the knowledge of it may save a great deal of expense to those who may be brought into court as I was. Had I known the rule beforehand, it would have saved at least a hundred pounds, which was expended in the travelling and maintenance of persons who were not called, and would not have been heard if they had.

A man who professes to come into court "with clean hands," as Mr Cockburn says Mr Scott did, though he obtain a verdict in his favour, gains no triumph when he dreads to let any man's testimony be heard. A man conscious of nothing amiss would desire all the world to speak what they knew of him. But Mr Scott oftener than once, by his counsel, stopt the mouth of witnesses, when he was afraid they would say something he did not wish the jury to hear. This was particularly glaring in the case of Mr Buchanan, when he was questioned about widow Haulin. Had her history, and that of her deceased husband, been as Mr Cockburn represents it in his speech, nothing could have served Mr Scott's cause better than to have had the case examined. Mr Jeffrey pleaded that we had no need to go into that case at all, and the court sustained his plea. Mr Scott knew that I had the widow in waiting for examination. She is one of his own people; she would not have said a word against him if she could help it; and could she have said a word for him would gladly have done it. Now had she been examined, and cross-examined;—had she proved Mr Cockburn's statement and disproved Mr Sym's, Mr Scott would have obtained a complete triumph. But he would not trust his cause to the oath of one of his own people, who is dependent upon him for the very pardon of her sins. Whence was this but from a consciousness that her examination could not be made to serve his cause, and might operate against it? Had he stood upon such high ground as Mr Cockburn represents, he should have heard what every one had to say. He ought to have left it to the court to check any one who went into irrevelent matter, either in asking questions, or answering them; but his counsel actually presumed to control the procedure, and to command my witnesses to be silent. See pp. 133, 135.

Mr Scott will perhaps reply, that I might have suborned witnesses to appear against him; but I have just as good reason to say this of him. But no man in his right mind, who knows what the ordeal of cross-examination is, would attempt such a thing. It is very easy to detect the contradictions of a false witness, for nothing but truth is consistent throughout. It is perhaps still more easy to get the truth out of honest witnesses, though injurious to the cause which they are originally adduced to support by their evidence. I would have elicited a great deal of truth in my own favour from Mr Scott's witnesses, had they been all examined. Indeed I did so from three or four of them, by cross-examination. James O'Conner proved Mr Scott's mentioning from the pulpit by name, certain persons who were guilty of drinking and falling behind in their payments for the chapel, p. 53, which must have been equal to a threatening. James Bowman, p. 62, proved the existence of a committee, of Mr Scott's congregation, organized for the purpose of giving circulation to the Catholic Vindicator, and bearing any loss that might be incurred by it. He proved farther, that the Vindicator reflected very much on Mr M'Gavin; and authenticated one of the placards by which he had been posted on the corners of the streets as a "defender of adultery," p. 63: and Mr Henniker proved Mr Scott's recommending to his people to buy up the work that contained such slander, p. 73. In short, by the two last mentioned, I proved a combination of Glasgow Papists, all of course under Mr Scott's influence, with his knowledge, and presumed concurrence;—a combination, I say, to blast, if possible, the character of Mr M'Gavin, by holding him up to the world as a monster not worthy to live in it. See Mr Moncrieff's speech, p. 117, and my 156th Number. And this same Mr Scott comes forward, claiming £3000 of damages from Mr M'Gavin, for injury alleged to have been done to his character, though Mr M'Gavin never wrote a sentence against his private or personal character; but merely against his official operations, and that solely for the purpose of illustrating the character of Popery, of which he is the active and official agent in this city.

It must have been from finding that his witnesses, like honest men, told the truth against himself, when examined by my counsel, that he did not venture to call more of them, for as Mr Moncrieff says, p. 129, there were in waiting about 60 whom he did not call. As it was, enough came out to convince those who heard it, that his hands were not so very clean, at least on the subject of calumnies uttered against his opponent; and when a man has thus taken the law in his own hand;—supposing him to have been slandered, when he publishes, or gives countenance to slander in return, he has no right to come into a court of law with a claim of damages. It is proved by several of his witnesses that he knew of the publication of the Vindicator; and some of them depone that he disapproved of it; but such is his influence over his people, that had he been sincere in his disapprobation, no committee of them would have dared to support, or give circulation to such a work. Besides, it is clearly proved, that he so far made himself a party, as to exhort his people, in the chapel, to buy it up, which does not indicate much disapprobation of it.

Now the slanders against me in the Vindicator, are of a personal nature. They do not relate merely to my authorship, which is a fair subject of censure to those who differ from me; but the accusations were against my personal moral character, when I was called a forger, a liar, and a defender of adultery. Here is fair ground for an action of damages against all who subscribed to support a work containing such libellous matter, as well as against any man who can be proved to have publicly recommended it, and advised those under his influence to purchase it. I do not say that I was injured by these calumnies, for happily I was too well known to admit of their making any impression; but what is called the animus injuriandi, the injurious intention, is sufficiently manifest, and is deserving of signal punishment.

No. CLXXIX.

SATURDAY, December 15th, 1821.

I return for a moment to the subject of Mr Scott's subscription books and calculations, which was discussed in the Number before last, I have to remark that my statement is confirmed by a statement of his own, which I had forgotten. If the reader will turn to No. CX. p. 461, he will find an allusion to a controversy in the Glasgow Courier, about the number of Papists in Glasgow and suburbs. A writer in that paper, who signed Julius, gave the number at 20,000; and referred to Mr Scott, by name, whom, he said, he had often heard, both in public and private, declare this to be the number; and moreover, referred to lists of names in Mr Scott's possession, as a proof of the fact. I had previously published a letter, in the Glasgow papers, in reply to the above writer, and in defence of Mr Cleland's tables, which I knew had been made up with great care. It was in answer to my letter that Julius stated the persons of his communion at 20,000, for the truth of which he referred me to Mr Scott's lists. I instantly wrote a reply, in which I called for the production of these lists; but its publication was superseded by Mr Scott, who voluntarily went to the Editor, and dictated the following paragraph:—

"To JULIUS. We are authorized to state, that the assertion in the letter signed Julius, in this paper of Saturday last, given as on the authority of the Rev. Mr Scott, that the number of Catholics, within the city and neighbourhood, nearly amounted to 20,000 souls, is not founded on fact. If Mr Scott ever made use of any such assertion, he could only mean, when the city and suburbs of Glasgow, with all Lanarkshire, parts of Renfrewshire, Dumbartonshire, Stirlingshire, and Linlithgowshire, were included. Julius published his statement wholly without consulting, or even the knowledge of Mr Scott. As to the lists which are said to have been handed to Mr Scott, as a farther proof of Julius's statement, that reverend gentleman DECLARES, that these lists never, in whole, contained more than from 2000 to 3000 names, including the counties above-mentioned. Glasgow, 10th May, 1820." See Glasgow Courier of the day following.

This is a declaration taken down from Mr Scott's own mouth in the Courier office; and it states explicitly that, down to May 1820, his lists never, in whole, exceeded from 2000 to 3000. By a mere common sense calculation, without recollecting that he had published such a statement, I made the number of his regular subscribers, down to March, 1817, 2319, to which add the 72 larger contributors, and we have within 109 of the medium between his two extremes. But he brings his statement down three years and two monhts later than his first inventory of productions, upon which my calculation was founded. Many new names must have been added to his lists during that time; and, therefore, allowing him to take the higher extreme as the whole number in May, 1820, my statement must be substantially correct for the time to which it relates, even allowing that the occasional donors of small sums were not then entered as subscribers.

It is a further corroboration of my statement, that bishop Cameron gives the number of Catholics, in and about Glasgow, who attend to their religious duties, as about 2000; Report, p. 45. Now, we know what is meant by attending to their religious duties:—it is being regular in their devotions, and punctual in their payments. The bishop means, of course, grown up men and women; he does not include children, as Mr Cockburn most absurdly did, in his halfpenny a week calculation. The bishop must have been thinking of the dream of Julius, when he mentioned the number of "nominal Catholics" here, as high as 18,000; and by his leave, I must object to the expression nominal Catholics; for, properly speaking, there are none such. He must know, at least as well as I, that all who have received canonical baptism are real "Catholic Christians," and have a right to all the other sacraments in their due order; and without this, they are not Catholics in any sense whatever. We say properly, a nominal Christian; that is, one who professes the faith, but who does not live the holy life of a Christian. But this distinction does not apply to the Catholic, for all are called and acknowledged to be such who have been baptized in the Church of Rome, and who have not become heretics, whatever their moral character may be.

It has been suggested that I ought to have deducted from the regular subscribers, all who paid only from ten to twenty shillings, in the course of forty-three months, that is, fifteen shillings, on an average, which is only about twopence a fortnight; and I believe there will be found not very many figures so low, in the fortnightly columns. The number that gave at the above rate is 692, see Report, p. 60; and certainly, if they and their contributions were deducted from the number of subscribers and the aggregate sum, the remaining subscribers must have paid a great deal more than sixpence a fortnight. But I do not think it necessary to make any alteration in my statement: for though we can form no average of sums stated merely as above £10, there is reason to conclude that these, together with those from £7 to £10, would amount to two or three hundred pounds more than the £426 3s., so often mentioned as the amount of the large donations. It is not necessary to go to work with such mathematical precision, as if we were calculating the hour when Jupiter and Saturn shall again be on the same meridian, as they seem to the eye to be, while I am writing this. From the documents produced, I have shown the average payments by each regular subscriber to have been sixpence a fortnight, or a small fraction more; and this being confirmed by Mr Scott's own books, I have no inclination to exaggerate the matter beyond what so plainly and indisputably appears.

I think I have now done with my calculations, which I am afraid will appear a very dull part of my work. I was induced to return to the subject at the beginning of this Number, from the recollection of Mr Scott's public statement in the Glasgow Courier. It is not for me to inquire how he, knowing that he had published such a statement, could instruct his counsel to give in, and argue upon one so different. I have nothing to do with this, or any of his private personal matters. I am discussing public documents, in which he does not appear in a character more sacred than my own, but merely as a dealer in pounds, shillings, and pence, collected from thousands of persons, and applied for a public purpose. I never questioned the faithfulness of the application; but the fact of the object being public, and of the documents being made public, in consequence of their being adduced against me in an action of damages, makes them a fit subject of public discussion, in my own defence; which would have been less necessary had it been possible for my counsel to have met his erroneous statements in court; for though the documents were given in beforehand, it never occurred to my counsel or to myself, that they were to be made use of to prove, that the contributions which our Glasgow Papists made for building the chapel, were only at the rate of a halfpenny a week. It does not even appear that Mr Scott himself, or his counsel, ever thought of rating the contributions of his people so very low, until the thing was suggested in court; and it would have required an hour of abstraction to have made the calculations necessary for exposing the error.

"From the Issues that have been read, and put into your hands," says Mr Cockburn to the jury, "you might at first sight, perhaps, be led to imagine there was some discussion here between the Catholics and Protestants; and, I have no doubt, the defender will endeavour, as far as he can, to make the question assume that appearance. But, I state to you precisely, this is an action for calumnies," &c. p. 12. Mr Moncrieff's reply to this, p. 96, is so full and explicit, that it is not necessary that I should add much to it. Mr Cockburn speaks as if he had been aware of the fact, and, indeed, he could not possibly be otherwise, if he had read my work from the beginning, as it was his duty to do, when he undertook the cause of my pursuer; he must, I say, have been aware of the very fact, that here there was a discussion between Catholics and Protestants, or rather of the principles held by each respectively. He does not tell the jury there was no such thing, for that he could not do consistently with his own knowledge of the fact; but he attempts to draw away their minds from the fact, and to fix them upon two or three points, relating to what he calls calumnies. Now, Mr Moncrieff shows most distinctly, that the whole controversy, from the very commencement, was a controversy about principles, and nothing else; and that the few anecdotes which were considered libellous, on which the action was founded, were brought forward merely as an illustration of certain principles maintained by the Church of Rome.

Mr Moncrieff shows very clearly that the controversy did not originate with me, but that I was provoked and drawn into it, by some of Mr Scott's own people; and any person may see that it was so, by reading the first and second letters which were printed in the Glasgow Chronicle. The paragraph about the congregation of Protestants who attended the Oratorio, paying great respect alike to the subject and the place, which originated the controversy, appeared in the Chronicle, as an article of news, inserted by the Editor on his own responsibility. I knew that the Editor was a Protestant, and my letter to him was intended to correct the foolish mistake into which he had fallen, in representing an assembly of Protestants as paying as much respect to the building in which they met, as they paid to the most solemn passages of the word of God. Here the matter might have rested, for I had no intention of writing a word more upon the subject; and here it would have rested, had not some of our Papists been so elated with the popularity of their Oratorio, or with something else, I shall not say what, that they would write a reply to my letter; and they did so, defending the holiness of their chapel, and attempting to "expose the weakness and futility of censorious bigotry." This was the commencement of a series of hostilities which I had never contemplated. I had addressed a Protestant friend, pointing out an expression in his paper, which I considered inconsistent with Protestant principles. I did not know that a Papist was the writer of the offensive paragraph; but when my strictures upon it appeared, our Papists claimed it as their own; at least, began to defend it, and to assail the objector, as a weak and censorious bigot. This, I say, was the commencement of the controversy. It was challenged by the Papists themselves; and if nobody had accepted the challenge, they would have had reason to boast, that they had established in Glasgow the principle, that the stones and timber of their chapel are as holy, and as much to be respected, as the word of God.

I need not point out to the reader what a contemptible figure these writers made, when they shrunk from a controversy which they themselves had provoked,—when they hired a man in London to maintain the cause which they could not maintain; and when even he was unable to maintain it, but shrunk away in disgrace; and when, having no other resource, they attempted, by means of a legal prosecution, to quash the controversy, and silence and punish the individual whom they had drawn out into the field, merely upon the defensive at first, but whom they afterwards found too offensive to be endured.

From the bluster which Mr Cockburn makes about my being silent, and finding no fault with Mr Scott's procedure, during all the time his chapel was a building, but virtually acquiescing in it, one would suppose that I had been constituted and appointed the official guardian of the Protestant religion, with a salary equal to the revenues of a bishopric in England. But the fact is, I had no more to do with Popery than Mr Cockburn himself; it was as much his duty as mine, to expose its wicked abominations; and, I suppose, had it fallen to his lot to be accused of "censorious bigotry," for merely stating a Protestant principle, which he holds as well as I, he might have been THE PROTESTANT, and I might have been one of his admiring readers:—for certain it is, that I had no more intention of commencing a controversy with the Church of Rome than he has at this moment. Such an attempt was as incompatible with my numerous avocations as it could be with his; but being unexpectedly drawn into it, I felt constrained by a sense of duty to both God and man, to persevere, regardless of the envenomed hostility of every Papist, and of the more offensive indifference of many a Protestant, who thought I had engaged in a very needless undertaking; and by the help of God I continue to this day, without having suffered the least injury from my Popish enemies, or the least embarrassment in the performance of any of the duties which devolve upon me, in my domestic, mercantile, and civil relations. Egotism is always a foolish thing; and there are few isms so apt to excite disgust; but from the example of an apostle (2 Cor. xi. xii.) we learn that it is lawful, when necessary, in self-defence.

Mr Cockburn goes on to say, after mentioning the inadequacy of the old chapel, and the necessity of having a new, and a larger one,—"I am sure there can be no idea or opinion but one, as to the expediency and piety of that design. As long as we happen to have such a town as Glasgow, of which a great part of the population is Catholic,—admitting it to be our duty to reclaim as many as we can to what we consider the pure faith,—the next object is to educate them according to their own religion." P. 12. I consider these as Mr Cockburn's own sentiments, and not any part of Mr Scott's furnishing; for there is an admission about "the pure faith," which Mr Scott would never have made with regard to any faith but his own. I ask the learned counsel, then, if it be really his opinion, that in any circumstances, it is the duty of Protestants to educate Papists according to their own religion? Mr Cockburn is not a mere lawyer. He is a highly respectable church-going man; and, if I am not mistaken, an elder of the Church of Scotland, which has been eminently distinguished for maintaining the doctrines of the Reformation, and for opposition to Popery. In this instance, then, I speak to a wise man, who knows the import of my question. Do you, Mr Cockburn, feel it to be your duty, when you fail to persuade a man to embrace the true faith, to teach him,—or to confirm him in his own faith, which you know to be false, and eternally ruinous to his soul? Do you think, that when Paul could not prevail upon the Ephesians to embrace the faith of Christ, he thought it his duty to educate them, and to confirm them in their devotion to the great goddess Diana, and the image which fell down from Jupiter? Unless you can answer this question in the affirmative, you must recall what you told the jury, about its being our duty to teach or educate Papists according to their own religion; for if you know what Popery is, and if you believe the doctrine of your own church, which I trust you do, you must be aware that Popery is as much opposed to the faith of Christ, as the worship of Diana was to that of the true God. If you did not know this before, you heard it from Mr Moncrieff, in his speech in reply to yourself, who, with much pathos, pointed out the destructive, but fundamental doctrine of the Church of Rome, that men must merit salvation for themselves, which doctrine is as much opposed to real Christianity, as the doctrine of Mahomet, or even of Voltaire, and his host of infidel disciples.

But the education of our Popish population is not the question. I never disputed Mr Scott's right to educate all who chose to submit to his lessons of instruction. I never called in question his right to build a chapel by means of the voluntary contributions of his people. The things which I objected to are so plainly laid down, that nobody could mistake them. They certainly are not objections to the education of Papists in any form, though if the subject had come in my way, I would have exposed the absurdity of Protestants undertaking the education of Papists "according to their own religion;" but the controversy, so far as I recollect, never turned upon this point.

If Mr Cockburn had alluded to the literary education of the children of our Papists, and spoken of this as a Christian duty, and work of piety, I should have made no objection. This is not educating Papists "according to their own religion;" but according to the common rules of grammar: and if this be a good work, "of the expediency and piety" of which there can be only one opinion, I shall put in my claim for a greater share of the piety than, perhaps, he can claim. It is not generally known, but it is a piece of genuine secret history, that the "Catholic schools" in this city are partly indebted to me for their very existence. The idea did not originate with me, but with a distinguished naval officer, who happened to spend a few months in this city, and who did not like to leave it without doing something for the benefit of his fellow-creatures. He had seen the good effects of establishing schools in St Giles', in London, for the education of the many thousands of poor Popish children which are to be found there. He thought something of the kind might be tried here; and, I believe, I was the first to whom he opened his mind on the subject. He could not indeed have taken a single step without the aid of some one possessed of local knowledge. His very first step was taken at my suggestion;—that was to wait upon Mr Scott, and respectfully state his object to him. If, said I, you get his concurrence, the thing will do; if not, you need not attempt it. He did accordingly wait on Mr Scott; and he, after considering the matter, and consulting his superior, gave his consent, and promised his co-operation; and, so far as I know, and have reason to believe, he has continued to fulfil his promise up to the present day. I was consulted in framing the constitution and rules of the society. I attended the first meetings of the committee, to see the machine set a going; and I became a subscriber to the funds.

Here there is more egotism; but it is necessary to bring such matter to view, to let Mr Cockburn see that I am not such a Goth as he would represent me to be;—that though I do not think it my duty to educate Papists "according to their own religion," I have given both my time and money to afford them the means of education in that which is really good and useful. This piece of secret history is also necessary to show, that so far from having any feeling of malice, or personal hostility against Mr Scott, I have given him, and am still disposed to give him, credit for what he has done, that is really useful to his people. There are few of his brethren who would have entered so heartily into the design of teaching the children of his communion to read the English version of the holy scriptures, and perhaps fewer that would have persevered as he has done, in actively superintending the schools, in which the English bible is read. It is also consistent with my knowledge, that he applied for, and obtained from the Bible Society, a number of bibles and testaments to be distributed among the poor of his flock. These things are honourable to him; and as such I state them to my readers. I wish it to be understood distinctly, that my controversy is not a personal one. As a citizen, Mr Scott is the same to me as another man; but as a teacher and preacher of Popery, and a promoter of the reign of antichrist among us, I am entitled to view him in his official capacity; and it is in that only that I wish to have any thing to do with him. It is Popery—the system of superstition, idolatry, and will-worship,—that I am opposing, and which I am determined to oppose to the uttermost. Great efforts, indeed, have been made to make this controversy appear as a mere personal squabble. Such it never was in my esteem; and such, I hope, it will not become. I am contending for principles, without regard to persons: they are principles intimately connected with our civil and religious liberties; and which, if abandoned, as they seem to be by many Protestants of the present day, will be remembered by a future age, with a feeling of contempt for those who could abandon privileges so valuable, and which had been procured at the expense of the blood of our more noble ancestors.

No. CLXXX.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 22D, 1821.

I DO not know whether sleight of hand or sleight of tongue be the more honourable and useful science. The former serves to amuse and astonish children, and the latter often serves to amuse and surprise grown persons. This is what we may call the legerdelingua art; and we have a fine example of it in Mr Cockburn's speech, which I shall introduce here for the amusement of my readers:—

"I have already stated to you," says Mr C. p. 32, "that I think there was no great sin in Mr Scott taking an interest about the building of the Catholic chapel. If he had been careless about that great work, I should have thought very little of him indeed. The law does not impose a contribution for any church except the established one: it is therefore the more incumbent as a moral duty, upon all other sects, to maintain their own establishments;—and if I could name the thing that was most proper for a man in Mr Scott's situation to look to, as a moral and Christian duty, it was to forward all in his power whatever was calculated to promote the education and moral good of the Catholics in Glasgow."

This passage begins with a high commendation of Mr Scott's zeal in rearing a splendid chapel; and the art which I have been speaking of appears in gliding away from that to the education and moral good of the people, leaving the just commendation of the latter to be applied to the former. Now these are things as different as any two things can be; and there is no necessary connection between them. Mr Cockburn here exemplifies that logical vice, that is called arguing from one thing to another. It is something like this:—The law does not allow fishermen to take herrings except during the night, therefore it is unlawful to shoot partridges during the day. The greatest novice of a sportsman would detect the fallacy of an argument drawn from the law about herring fishing, when applied to the privilege of partridge shooting; and the merest novice in moral philosophy will also detect the fallacy of deducing an argument for the building of gorgeous temples, from the admission that it is a moral and Christian duty to educate and otherwise promote the good of the poor and ignorant. The fact will illustrate the difference between the two:—while the Glasgow Papists were spending their zeal, and strength, and money, in rearing a gorgeous temple, it was left to Captain Gordon and myself, and other Protestants, to devise means for their education and moral improvement, and to raise funds for the purpose. It does not appear that ever the Papists thought of education as at all necessary, or that they thought of devising means for imparting it, till it was urged upon them by Protestants; and then, to be sure, as I said in my last, they gave their concurrence; but such being the fact, the reader will be able to appreciate the value of Mr Cockburn's eulogium of Mr Scott, for doing all in his power to forward "whatever was calculated to promote the education and moral good of the Catholics in Glasgow."

Perhaps Mr Cockburn meant it to be understood, that the building of the splendid chapel was the best means of promoting the education and moral good of the "poor Catholics;" and, I doubt not, Mr Scott "will do what he can to make the question assume that appearance." I consider this therefore as his sentiment, not Mr Cockburn's; and a very absurd sentiment it is:—For, in the first place, I have just shown, that while he and his people were exerting all their energies upon the building of this chapel, they do not appear ever to have thought of education as a thing with which they had any thing to do. And, in the second place, the erection of such a chapel, considering the state and condition of the people for whose use it was intended, was most absurd and ridiculous, and therefore could not promote their moral good in any way whatever.

I shall suppose for a moment, that when Mr Cockburn said education, he meant instruction; and that he considered the having a chapel to meet in as necessary for the instruction of the people; and I am willing to concede this to him, so far as it will apply to such a building as was suitable for such a people:—that is, a plain homely edifice, such as might have been built, in any part of the suburbs where Papists abound, for a thousand or twelve hundred pounds; or two such edifices, if necessary, at convenient distances. This is what sensible rational men would have done, upon the supposition that there was sense and reason in the instruction which was meant to be communicated. But I ask Mr Cockburn, or Mr Scott, to tell me, how the instruction or moral good of thousands of poor people could be promoted by building a palace, or a temple, which they cannot enter, or even look at, without being overwhelmed by a sense of their own poverty and meanness? And how they can be edified or instructed by the consideration, that they meet in a house which cost so many thousand pounds, when one built at an expense of less than as many hundreds would have been more like them, and would have suited them better? What would you think if you saw a dustman, or a coalporter, in his ragged and sordid apparel, having his head covered with a silk hat, or a velvet cap, ornamented with a gold band and buckle? You would say, the poor man was beside himself; that his friends or the parish officers ought to provide a suitable asylum for him. You would never imagine that those who were so foolish as to decorate him with such gaudy and costly finery, intended to promote his education, instruction, or moral good; but that they meant to make a fool of him, or to make him appear a fool. I leave it to those who have contrasted the magnificence of Clyde Street chapel, with the general poverty of the congregation that meets in it, to apply these remarks; and to tell the world, how the erection of such a building could tend to the education, instruction, or moral good of such a people.

The fact is, the chapel was not meant solely, or even chiefly, for the use of the poor people who paid their hard-earned sixpences towards the building of it. To suppose that it was, would be such an impeachment of the common sense of all concerned as I do not think they deserve. They imagined, that by the fascination of their fine building, "resembling as much as possible the majesty of that God to whom it was dedicated," as Amicus Veritatis said, and by the charms of their music, and the pomp of their ritual, they would gain over to their religion the principal inhabitants of the city and surrounding country. It must be allowed they had some reason to expect this, when they got Protestants to subscribe for the undertaking. But they must now feel the disappointment of not having made one convert, high or low, rich or poor; and if Mr Cockburn shall come here next circuit, I advise him to make strict search, and minute investigation, and then to say, whether one individual, man, woman, or child, has been benefited, in the way of education, or moral improvement, by means of this great Romish temple.

No remark seems necessary on what Mr Cockburn says about Mr Scott's glorying and boasting of the hand which he had in that great work. But we cannot silently pass what immediately follows, at the top of page 33, "It was pretty well known," says Mr C. "who were Catholics, and what was their number, about this time. Mr Scott did not go about among them himself—but all the respectable persons of his congregation, forty, fifty, or sixty, were named collectors. Each took a part of the town or congregation. You will see them here to-day." The learned gentleman proceeds to assert, that the number of Mr Scott's congregation was between nine and ten thousand; and yet in the same breath we are informed, that ALL the respectable persons among them were only forty, fifty, or, at the most, sixty; and that the jury would have an opportunity of seeing them all. Taking the number at only 8000, there are 7940 excluded from the rank of respectable persons, which lets us see what sort of a congregation Mr Scott has, if the statement which he put in Mr Cockburn's mouth be true; if it be not true, I advise the 7940 calumniated persons to raise an action of damages for a libel, against their priest and his counsel, jointly and severally; and if they do so, I think they will carve out work for both, for the remainder of their lives.

It would be endless to animadvert on every sentence that dropped from the mouth of the eloquent counsel. I pass on, therefore, to page 42. "There is," says Mr Cockburn, "in Scotland a prejudice against Catholics, a prejudice which, I hope, will last, as most salutary; and at Glasgow it rages most, because there the lowest description of Catholics abound, and the people notoriously live in a sort of alarm from them. Therefore it was peculiarly patriotic and proper in Mr Scott, to endeavour to reclaim them; not by teaching them that their pastor was a rogue, despising their chapel and institutions; but teaching them, and recommending to them, 'send your children, and go yourselves to our chapel.' It was, therefore, peculiarly absurd for Mr M'Gavin to throw his firebrands into this place, knowing every publication was doing an injury not merely to Mr Scott and the Catholic religion, but to the peace of the country, which nothing he, or any person could do, could prevent."

There are some strange inconsistencies in this passage, which I cannot account for otherwise than by supposing, that it is partly Mr Cockburn's own, and partly the furnishing of Mr Scott; and these two, like the iron and the clay, in the feet of Nebuchadnezzar's image, could not unite to make one coherent substance. We are told that there is in Scotland a prejudice against Catholics—it should be against Popery, not against the persons of any:—Mr Cockburn hopes this prejudice will last, because it is most salutary; that is, necessary, or useful, for our welfare. Then how would it be a patriotic or proper thing in Mr Scott, or any man, to draw men to the chapel, for the purpose of teaching them, or confirming them in that against which a prejudice ought always to exist? If the people of Glasgow regard Papists with alarm, because they are Papists, and no other reason is assigned, how could it be patriotic in Mr Scott to confirm them in their Popery? It was patriotism to endeavour to reclaim them from Popery, and this praise belongs to me, not to Mr Scott. As for Mr M'Gavin's throwing firebrands into the place, it is a mere figure of speech, without meaning, and without truth, even as a metaphor. That I knew I was doing injury to Mr Scott, is also untrue; for he has suffered nothing in person or property, or character, by any thing I have written; and when he was put to prove the point, he could not bring a particle of evidence of injury sustained by him. That I was doing injury to what he calls the Catholic religion, but which I call Popery, may be true; just as the fever committee did injury to the typhus fever, when they laboured by lawful means, to stop its progress, and effect its extirpation. I have no hope of being so successful in extirpating Popery as my friends were in extirpating the fever; but I hold it to be my duty, and that of every good citizen, to do what he can to prevent the spreading of pestilence of every kind, especially the great moral pestilence of Popish error and impiety, that issues like smoke and brimstone from the mouth of the beast and the false prophet.

Mr Cockburn asserts further, that I knew that every publication of mine was doing an injury to the peace of the country. Here I meet him again with a broad contradiction; and I challenge him and his client to the proof. I do not say only, that I did not know such a thing; but I assert that no such thing ever happened by any writing of mine. This, however, is the common cant of modern Papists and their Protestant advocates. When a number of Protestants met in Greenock, to have their principles illustrated and confirmed, by reading The Protestant, though as quiet as if they had been hearing a sermon, it was declared by the Popish priest, to be endangering the peace of the town, and he actually applied to the magistrates to prohibit the meeting. In Preston the Popish priests had long been preaching against the established religion, no man forbidding them; but when a few Protestant ministers commenced a lecture in defence of their religion, the Papists applied to the magistrates to prohibit th's, as dangerous to the peace of the town. What is this but telling the world plainly, that the peace of the country depends upon keeping them in good humour,—in allowing them to declaim as much as they please against the Protestant faith; but that we must not write or preach a word against their superstitions? Yes: the Papists themselves thus tell us, they are ready to take fire at the slightest spark, or without a spark; and that they will break the peace, if Protestants shall publicly defend, merely by argument, the established religion, in opposition to their absurdities and idolatrous superstitions. This is the plain English of the language Mr Scott put into Mr Cockburn's mouth. Had Mr C. been on the other side; and had he said half as much against Papists, or even Popery, as he said against The Protestant, he would have fallen under the same condemnation. His speech would have been called an incendiary one, and calculated to injure the peace of the country. This should teach all Protestants how to value the allegiance, or patriotism, or good disposition of Papists toward their neighbours, or their country. All depends,—not on being allowed to hold their errors, for that no man can prevent,—but all depends on their being allowed to propagate their errors without opposition or contradiction; for he who shall publish a word against them will be accused of endangering the peace of the country.

But I must hasten to be done with Mr Cockburn and his speech. I pass on, therefore, to the next paragraph, p. 42. "Then observe," says he, "if there be any thing in his apology of his desire to resist the errors of Popery. For such resistance, there was no need to publish his calumnies against Mr Scott as he did. The best resistance is by argument, which men can read calmly and deliberately." Here we are perfectly agreed; and what Mr Cockburn calls the "best resistance," is the very thing that I have been doing all along. I have been combating the errors of Popery by argument, and by historical facts, for three years and a half; but this was the very thing which Mr Scott did not like, and which Popery could not endure. Why did not Mr Cockburn tell his client,—he had no occasion to bring this action as he did? Why did he not tell him as he tells me,—"the best resistance is by argument?" Why not tell him, that if his religion were the true one, calumnies would not hurt it; and if it was a false one, the result of a lawsuit could not help it; but that by argument it must stand or fall? This would have been sound advice; and since he condescends to tell me, as if I did not know it, that the best resistance of error is by argument, I advise him to impress his lesson upon Mr Scott, if he should ever return to him on a like errand.

The Numbers of my work now amount to one hundred and eighty; and all that Mr Scott and his counsel call calumnies are to be found in three of these Numbers, and a single paragraph of a letter in the Glasgow Chronicle. All the rest is argument, and fact, and illustration; and the very things which are called calumnies, are used merely for the purpose of illustration; and it is probable I would never so much as have mentioned Mr Scott's name if he had not thrust himself forward, as if to make himself a party in the controversy which two of his people had unwarily provoked. The things called calumnies were no doubt used in the course of argument; but arguments and principles are the things with which I have had to do throughout the whole of my work, for the truth of which I appeal to all who have read it.

Here I shall use the freedom to retort a little on the learned counsel. In pleading the cause of his client, he ought to have known that argument was the best weapon. "There was no need of publishing his calumnies against" Mr M'Gavin "as he did." He says to the jury, p. 16, "If you find Mr M'Gavin equivocating, or giving evasive answers,"&c. Here is a libel and a calumny as actionable as any thing I ever said of Mr Scott. It is true Mr Cockburn is skilful enough to put the charge of equivocating in a hypothetical form, to avoid, perhaps, the consequences of a direct charge; but this would avail him nothing, if he had not stood under the panoply of his official privilege. The first paragraph on which Mr Scott founded his first Issue, is a mere hypothesis of mine; yet it was argued upon by Mr Cockburn himself as if it had been a direct assertion; and as such, I suppose, the court viewed it. I consider Mr Cockburn, therefore, as having uttered a calumny and a libel against me, in open court, and which has gone forth to the world in the report of his speech; and a calumny without the shadow of a foundation, even according to his own showing; for he did not point out a sentence or syllable of my writing to which the word "equivocating" could be applied; and I defy him and all the world to point out any such sentence. I know that Mr Cockburn cannot be made answerable for this in a court of law, for he would plead his privilege of being entitled to say what his client had instructed him to say: but then the calumny reverts to his client, who, in bringing an action for calumnies, ought to have kept his own hands clean.

Only one word more on this celebrated speech, and I have done. The speaker attempts to show, p. 44, that the reports about Mr Scott's taking money from poor people for his chapel, had no existence till I raised them, or gave currency to them. In answer to which I refer to the depositions of Messrs Buchanan, Ellis, Cleland, Dickie, Leechman, Hood, Swanston, and Miller, near the conclusion of the Report, all of whom swore distinctly, that the thing was the subject of general conversation, report, and belief, in the years 1815, 1816, and 1817; that is, before THE PROTESTANT had any existence.

Mr Cockburn's speech is followed by the depositions of bishop Cameron and others, into the matter of which I need not enter particularly. The first seems to have proved himself a party in the cause, seeing he made Mr Scott appear in the character of his agent, and acting entirely under his authority and control. It is doubtful, therefore, how far the bishop's evidence ought to have been sustained; but no objection was made by counsel. The depositions of the pursuer's witnesses occupy a great space; those of the defender only four or five pages; the former having been taken down verbatim, while of the latter, only the substance is given, for the reason assigned, p. 132. Yet there are three of the four Issues which appear to have proof in support of them; to wit, that Mr Scott applied to Mr Fleming to have part of his workmen's wages retained, and paid to him for the building of this chapel; which shows that in this case the contribution was something else than voluntary. Henry Courtney and his wife deponed to the refusal of baptism to their child, till they paid five shillings towards the chapel, though they were very poor, and had only three shillings in the world. John Drain and his wife deponed to the refusal of baptism to their child, though apparently dying, because he could not pay a sum of money towards the chapel, in consequence of which they carried the child to Paisley, and had it baptized there.

Seeing so much appeared supported by evidence, the reader will probably ask, "For what was it that the jury found you liable in £100 of damages, which saddled you with nearly £1000 of expenses?" and my answer is, "I cannot tell." The jury found nothing proved, and nothing not proved. Had Mr Scott made out his case, they would doubtless have given him more damages, for what they gave leaves him minus a large sum of expenses, which the court would not allow him; so that, like the Irish comedian, he gained a great loss by his benefit. In short, I do not know for what word, or sentence, or action of mine, I was ordained to pay this money; and it cannot now be known while the world stands.

I am ashamed when I reflect, that about this Trial, and about myself, I have occupied five Numbers of my work; and yet I have not said one-half of what might be said. I must, however, leave the subject for the present. I have heard it whispered that Mr Scott's agents had a Report of the Trial, which they delayed publishing till they saw what the other was like. Perhaps they will bring it forward now; and I am not without a hope that it may contain Mr Jeffrey's speech. If so, it will afford me materials for several Numbers; and there is nothing that I desire more in relation to this part of the controversy, than to have an opportunity of cutting up that most singular composition, if composition it could be called. I requested the shorthand writer to apply to Mr Jeffrey himself for it; and, if necessary, to go the length of twenty guineas for the expense of having it written at his dictation. A considerable expense was incurred by calling for Mr Jeffrey, and writing to his clerk on the subject; but, from what cause I know not, it could not be obtained. If it should never appear entire, I shall sometime find an opening for a few strictures on the fragment of it that is preserved.

No. CLXXXI.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 29TH, 1821.

I AM indebted to an unknown correspondent for the following sensible Letter, which I think it right to dispose of, before entering upon another general subject:—

TO THE PROTESTANT.

SIR,

Amongst the readers of the Protestant, there is not one who more sincerely wishes you success than myself. Every one who is alive to the great struggle which has existed betwixt light and darkness ever since "light came into the world," and all who know what a grievous darkness Popery is, must bid you God speed, and must rejoice in the talent you have so successfully put forth in exposing the Man of Sin; for my own part, I feel a great interest in your enterprize, and when, by any slip, a door is opened for an irruption of the enemy, I feel as great a regret, and as strong a desire to repair it, as if committed by myself. This must be my excuse for troubling you just now, to remark, that in various cases of late, when you are instancing from the writings of others, the pernicious effects of the Popish tenets, you do not seem to have been careful enough in selecting, to avoid narrating cases, which are in reality not credible, and which are therefore easily perverted into an attack on the essential truths you are defending. You too well know the nature of Popish controversialists, to render it necessary for me to waste words on the unfairness of their dealings; honest argument is out of the question; they lay hold of some unguarded expression, or some accidental misstatement, and by harping on that, they endeavour to shake those substantial truths that they cannot otherwise touch. Now in some of your late extracts, it appears to me, that this advantage has been given them, I think, needlessly, because there is no want of the best authenticated proofs of the unrelenting and ferocious spirit of the Popish superstition; and there is no need of exaggeration to make us shudder at them. Thus, in your 116th Number, in speaking of the evil consequences of the celibacy of the Romish priests, you mention very gravely, and very shortly, that the skulls of six thousand children had been found in a fish pond. Now, had the author, from whom you quote, merely said, that, as a consequence of that most pernicious tenet, infanticide was common, and that in such a pond many bodies of infants had been found; nay, had he gone further and said, that to the amount of sixty had been found, the thing was credible; and for my own part, extraordinary as the thing appears now-a-days, I believe, that in a populous neighbourhood at the period alluded to, the thing may have happened; but when it is dryly said, that in such a pond six thousand childrens' skulls were found, the thing is utterly incredible, being repugnant to nature, to common sense, and to the very chemical properties of matter; the person who can seriously think of it, and then say he fully believes it, ought to find nothing incredible in transubstantiation. It is just one of those cases, by the dissecting and dilating upon which, a Papist would attempt to baffle the solid sense and sound argument of the Protestant; and therefore it was that I felt so much regret when I met with it. Supposing that, in the neighbourhood of Glasgow, a pond should be set apart for the deposition of the heads of murdered infants; suppose also Popery reigning in full supremacy; suppose further, that every Popish priest and shaveling within the bills of mortality had annually five bastards, which is a tolerable allowance;—

suppose that there was nothing either unnatural or disgraceful in the girls bringing the childrens' heads regularly to the pond, but that they would do it as unconcernedly as with eggs to market; still it can easily be shown that the number your author mentions could not by possibility be accumulated. The allowing, therefore, so monstrous an absurdity to appear in The Protestant, allows the enemies of truth to turn your main arguments against yourself, for there is no fable in all the legends of Popery that exceeds this. I know not how it can be now remedied;—should it seem an error of the press, and for 6000 read 60, I should be well pleased.

In your 125th Number, you mention about the garrison of Carcassone marching nine miles under ground. I meant to have made some remarks on the unguarded way you had made your extract on this subject, but I see my paper is nearly out, and I find my time will not permit it; besides, I do not know how you may take a communication of this sort; I hope you will not think it frivolous, for I can assure you the effect is not so, and whilst you bear the more noble and weighty task in hand, of enforcing essential truth, I trust you will excuse a friend of yourself, and your cause, for endeavouring to put you on your guard in points, which perhaps you may esteem superficial, but which, I am seriously persuaded, have a strong bearing on the general result of your endeavour in "enforcing the cause of truth."

With every wish for your success,

Yours, &c.

W. A. C.

I feel very much obliged to this writer, for his very judicious observations; and I should be unworthy of his good opinion, if it were possible that I could take such a communication otherwise than in good part. My object in writing is neither literary fame nor pecuniary profit; but solely to serve the cause of truth by opposing error; and, therefore, I rank among my friends and auxiliaries, all who do me the favour of pointing out any mistake into which I have fallen in my own arguments or statements; or any misstatement or mistake of others, to which I may inadvertently give currency.

The statement that six thousand heads of murdered infants, the fruits of illicit intercourse, were found in a fish pond, is given by the author of "Letters on Clerical Celibacy," on the authority of Balæus, Acta Rom. Pont. p. 46. I recollect to have seen the same statement in an old folio in my possession, in which the reason for draining the pond is given; but I cannot at present find the passage. I do however agree with my correspondent, that the thing is incredible; and I would probably have said so at the time, in a note, had I subjected the statement to a process of calculation. The author of the Letters on Celibacy, gives the number in words; so it can be no error of the press arising from the addition of a figure or two; but it is probable that some earlier writer may have given it in figures, and that by mistake a cypher has been added, turning 600 into 6000; for I see no occasion to go so low as 60.

But while I perfectly agree with my correspondent, that the story of six thousand is incredible, I am by no means prepared to say it is physically impossible, unless I am made acquainted with the population of Rome at the time; and unless I have it ascertained how long the decomposition of infants' bones requires. Suppose it were to require ten years in a marshy place, not exposed to the weather, six hundred a year for that period would make up the number. This I admit is incredible; but I am not convinced that it is impossible; considering the population and the profligacy of that city at the period referred to, or at any period before it was pillaged, and the monasteries broken up, by the French under Buonaparte. And now that some of the monasteries are restored, and the rooks have returned to their nests, as John Knox would have said, the thing is not impossible, if the statement of a late traveller may be depended on. I refer to an American work, entitled, "The Political State of Italy, by Theodore Lyman, jun." printed in Boston, N. E. in 1820. Speaking of Rome, this writer says, "In the great hospital of Spirito Santo, there were exposed during 1817, at the wheel, male children, 516, female 497, total 1013; at board in the country 1735 = 2748. Of these restored to parents, male 60, female 70 = 130; died in the hospital 419, at board 550, total 969; being nearly one in every three." "The children in this hospital," adds Mr Lyman, "are illegitimate, or destitute ones. They are put in the night upon a hollow wheel, near which is hung a bell, and whenever this bell is rung, an attendant comes, turns the wheel, and receives the child. They are maintained till twelve years of age; a letter is often placed with the child, so that it may be recognized at a future time. This institution would afford much less encouragement to vice, if children were only received in broad day light, and after proper examination of the situation of parents," p. 103.

At this time the population of Rome was only 131,256, considerably under the present population of Glasgow, and not half of what it must have been in the days of Rome's glory and greatest profligacy. In 1817, the number of male ecclesiastics in Rome, was 2899, and of nuns only 1303. Before the Reformation the latter must have been a great deal more numerous, and perhaps also the former. But I shall take the population of that year for my datum; and I think I can show by it, that however incredible the above statement may be, it is by no means impossible. There were 1013 children exposed in Rome, and for the most part abandoned, in the course of one year, only four years ago; that is, nearly three every night, upon an average. Now make the supposition that instead of exposing them in the hospital wheel, or that there were no such asylum for them, and that the unnatural mothers had thrown them into the lake or pond, the incredible number of six thousand would have accumulated in less than six years. This is, indeed, a most horrible supposition; but there is nothing impossible in it; for it is only supposing a greater degree of depravity in these females than that which leads to the abandonment of their offspring. Nay, if child murder be possible in one instance, it is not physically impossible in any number of instances in proportion to the population of a city or district. I hope, therefore, my correspondent will be convinced that one may believe the statement, monstrous as it is, without imitating the absurdity of those who believe in transubstantiation.

W. A. C. makes a supposition with regard to Popish priests and shavelings, which, if applied to those in Rome, would produce a monstrous result indeed,—no fewer than 14,495 illegitimate children annually! If this were the case, I am sure he himself would see nothing even incredible in the statement on which he animadverts. He has not considered the state of the population of Rome, where the proportion of ecclesiastics is a hundred to one of the number of clergy necessary for the service of a Protestant city like Glasgow. The nuns, according to Mr Lyman's statement, were comparatively few in 1817; but that was only three years after the restoration of the ancient order. In a subsequent statement, he gives a list of seventy-seven nunneries in the city alone; and in 1819, the number of nuns had increased to 1463. No doubt there is a farther increase by this time; and they will continue to increase until all the houses be as full as they were before the French invasion. It is needless to dilate on such a subject, or to point out the horrible immoralities that must be the consequence of such a state of things. Luxury, idleness, and celibacy, on a large scale, are enough to qualify the world for another deluge; and because of these things, I have no doubt, the wrath of God, will, by and by, come upon Rome to the uttermost.

With regard to the statement relating to the garrison of Carcassone, it is given by Jones in his History of the Waldenses, and it does not appear to me incredible. Many greater works have been effected in our own day than digging an excavation of nine miles, arching it over, and then using it as a subterraneous passage.

Upon the whole, I am perfectly aware of the truth and propriety of my correspondent's remarks. Papists cannot meet an opponent with fair argument; and they seldom attempt it. It is their constant practice to draw away the mind from facts and principles, and to fix it on some trifle, that is really or apparently incredible or absurd; but which is of no importance in relation to the general question in dispute. When they cannot find real absurdities and things incredible, they will feign them, and endeavour to make their own inventions appear the arguments and statements of their opponents. Their whole system is built on falsehood, of which there cannot be a better evidence than the manner in which they constantly try to defend it.

They will no doubt attempt to find a flaw in Mr Lyman's statement too. They will say, it is impossible in the nature of things, supposing all the nuns to be as bad as possible, that 1303 of them could produce 1013 children annually. And this objection will startle some persons; and they will disbelieve the whole story; but let it be observed, the author does not confine his statement to priests and nuns; nor does he speak of them at all as particularly implicated. He regards the convents with much respect and tenderness; and he indeed speaks of the system in such a manner as makes me believe that he belongs to the Church of Rome. He does not so much as hint a suspicion that the ecclesiastics of either sex have any hand in filling the hospital wheel with three children every night. It is the general profligacy of manners in Rome that he brings to view; and the reader is left to make his own remarks, and draw his own conclusion, with regard to the influence which clerical celibacy may have had in producing that profligacy.

Persons acquainted with the history of Rome, and with human nature, will find no difficulty in drawing conclusions from clerical celibacy to general profligacy of manners; and such persons will regard with real concern, and serious apprehension, the introduction of the monastic system among ourselves, at least among our neighbours in Ireland. Several attempts have been made of late to make celibacy popular in that kingdom, by pompous representations of the ridiculous solemnity of foolish young girls taking the veil, as if this were a most meritorious act, and worthy of the admiration of angels and men. The following has appeared in several newspapers, in the present month:—

PRESENTATION CONVENT, GALWAY.

(From the Connaught Journal.)

"Miss Joyce, daughter of Walter Joyce, Esq. of Mervieu, was received to-day (Monday week) amongst the pious and exemplary sisterhood of the Presentation Convent. Scarcely have we ever witnessed a scene more sublimely imposing. The young and promising daughter of one of our most respectable and esteemed citizens presenting herself at the altar of her God,—in the abandonment of every earthly consideration,—in the sacrifice of every thing that could bespeak permanency to social life and to social happiness,—in the dedication of her exalted talents—of her young and innocent loveliness—of the world's promise and the world's hopes,—must, indeed, be capable of awakening in the breasts of all a generous and a dignified association, whilst it affords a high and important colouring to the completion of her future existence, and her ultimate destiny.

"At half-past nine, the 'O gloriosa virginum' was sung from the higher choir, in the masterly accompaniment of select musical performers. The procession then began to move from the vestry, through the lower choir, to the chapel, in the following order:—

The Thuriferere,
The Acolytes,
The Master of the Ceremonies, Rev. Mr DALY,
The Sub-Deacon, Rev. Mr GILL,
Deacon, Rev. Mr O'DONNELL,
The High Priest, Rev. Mr FINN,
The Celebrant, Very Rev. Warden FFRENCH, and his Train-bearer.

"The very Rev. Warden Ffrench having been conducted to his faldastorium, under a rich canopy, the high priest and his officiating ministers retired to their places at the gospel side of the altar.

"And now all was breathless expectation: the young postulant appeared in the attendance of the reverend mother and her assistant, robed in all the gaudy extravagance of fashionable splendour, and beaming in the glows of youthful modesty, which taught us to believe, that had she remained in the world she forsook, she would have moved the attraction of every heart, 'the leading star of every eye.'

"The very Rev. Celebrant was then conducted to the platform of the altar, and the postulant and her attendants having genuflected, the ceremony of reception began with the preparatory prayers and responsories. When the novice was seated, and the Celebrant reconducted to the faldastorium, high mass commenced with peculiar dignity, and with a strict precision in all the various ceremonies, which always render the Catholic service sublime. After the gospel, the Rev. Mr Daly delivered an excellent sermon, addressed peculiarly to the novice, and prefaced by a text admirably pertinent to the subject he handled:—'Hearken, O daughter, and see, and incline thine ear; thou shalt leave thy people, and thy father's house, for the king hath greatly desired thy beauty; and he is the Lord thy God.'—Psal. xlv.

"After mass the novice retired, whilst the clerical choir chanted in full tone, the psalm, 'In exitu Israel de Egypto.' At the conclusion of the Psalm she appeared disrobed of her worldly habiliments, and vested in the simplicity of penance and retirement. In the different answers to the questions put to her by the Celebrant, she was clear and decisive, like one whose determination of embracing a life of religion, and of chastity, was that of long and conclusive reflection. The ceremony on the whole created a deep and general interest.

"The chapel and lower choir were crowded with the first of rank and distinction in our town and its vicinity. We recognized among them the respectable families of his grace the Archbishop of Tuam, Collector Reilly, our worthy Mayor, Colonel Carey, &c."

On the above statement some very judicious remarks have been made in some of the newspapers; but none of the writers seem to have been aware of the shocking enormity that the Church of Rome has the impudence to practise in open day. Let them call this what they will, it is as really a human sacrifice as the burning of widows in Hindoostan, with the ashes of their husbands; and I can easily imagine, that in the case of the young girl above described, it may be a greater sacrifice than that of a wretched widow who offers herself to the flames, to terminate her sorrows, as she believes, in a few minutes, rather than to drag out a life of misery. Here a silly young creature is represented as devoting herself to a life of celibacy and perpetual seclusion from the world, which must be a life of delusion or of misery, or of both; because it is contrary to the appointment of God, who requires no man or woman to relinquish the advantages of social and domestic intercourse, or to become thus secluded from the world; but who rather commands all to occupy the sphere which in his providence he assigns them in the world, for his glory, and the good of their fellow-creatures.

There is something inexpressibly shocking and revolting in the style of the above narrative. The writer allows his fancy to luxuriate on the personal beauty of the victim brought to the altar to be sacrificed—to what, I shall not say or surmise. From the abominable profanation of the word of God, by the accommodation of the "text admirably pertinent to the subject," we cannot say what the priests may not devise and execute. Men who can so prostitute the word of God, as to apply what he says of spiritual and inward holiness to carnal beauty, may, by and by, alter the same passage by putting the word "priest" in place of "king," and then use the bible itself as a pander of wickedness.

It is a fact not generally known, that there is a convent of nuns in the heart of London. They belong to an order that left England on the suppression of the monasteries at the Reformation, and settled in the Netherlands. The seminary, if such it could be called, was kept up chiefly by recruits from England, for more than two centuries; when, on the disasters following the French revolution, the sisterhood were driven to seek refuge in England, from which their predecessors had been driven. They were living in London in great comfort in 1814, as appears by the Orthodox Journal for that year, when a controversy arose about their dress, which it seems was offensive to London Protestants; and they were ordered by authority to lay it aside, and dress like other people. This, so far as appears, was merely an order by their spiritual superiors, who were afraid of the odium that might be occasioned by the monastic habits in London; but great pains were taken to make the order appear an act of the ministry, who, I suppose, knew no more of the matter than I did at the time.

No. CLXXXII.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 5TH, 1822.

WHEN I first saw the title of Dr Milner's great work, "The End of Religious Controversy," I understood him to mean the "final end" or design of the thing; which is, or should be, the discovery of truth and the exposure of error. But I had not read many sentences till I discovered that he meant the actual conclusion, or termination, of all controversy on religious subjects. Yes: this foreign bishop, and vicar apostolic, has actually the vanity and presumption to tell the world, that this work of his settles all controversies, and puts an end to all disputes about religion. He tells us that Christianity is the religion of Rome, and submission to the Pope; and this must end all disputes; for he has said it, and that is enough. Had there been no disputes before, this work would have been properly called the beginning of religious controversy; for it suggests innumerable subjects of debate; but as things are, and have been, I think it ought not to have been called either the "beginning," or the "end," but the "middle;" for there was religious controversy before, and there has been since, and there shall be yet more; and this same work of Dr Milner is calculated to produce more controversy than any other publication by the Papists of the present day. The Rev. Mr Grier has added a large volume to "the end," or termination; and THE PROTESTANT is about to add to it something more; so that the vicar apostolic will find that he has not done up his subject so completely as he imagined.

The work is preceded by an address to the Lord Bishop of St David's, and followed by an appendix relative to the writings of the same prelate; in both which the writer displays a spirit of rancorous hostility, too strong for even the cunning of Jesuitism to conceal. Had he imbibed a sufficient portion of the spirit of the great father of the order, he would have studied to conciliate a dignified individual, whose vote will tell in the House of Lords whenever the "Catholic Question" comes to be agitated, and whose profound learning, and well known attachment to the constitution, as established in 1688, give him an influence with other members of that noble house. But Dr Milner so far forgets his duty as a member of the holy fraternity, which is to promote the interest of the order, and of the Pope, by all possible means, that he allows himself to indulge in personalities, calculated to irritate the persons of whom he asks the favour of emancipation, which shows the irritability of his own temper, and also how deeply he feels the injury which my lord of St David's has done to the cause of Popery by his writings.

The introductory address and the appendix are both in the same style, only there is more venom in the latter than in the former. In both there is a petulance, and impudent disregard of historical truth, which cannot find a parallel in the writings of any other author with which I am acquainted, except in those of his own protegee, W. Eusebius Andrews, the Catholic Vindicator, concerning whom bishop Cameron swears,—he never approved of any thing that came from that man.—See Report of Trial, p. 47. Dr Milner's style, like that of Mr Andrews, is petulant but never rises even to the dignity of manly sarcasm. It is more polite, indeed, more grammatical; and his vocables are better chosen and arranged; but, upon the whole, he discovers nothing of a superior, or well cultivated mind. Considering the rank and learning of the person whom he addresses, his style partakes as much of insolence as petulance; and I do not know any thing to which it can be so justly compared, as to the rudeness of ill-bred boys and girls, in the streets, who delight in throwing dirt on the clothes of such passengers as show by their dress that they are superior to themselves.

This "End of Religious Controversy" bears one of the most prominent marks of the beast in its very front; that is, downright lying and imposition. Of the bishop of St David's the author writes as follows:—"He comes forward in his episcopal mitre, bearing in his hands a new Protestant Catechism, to be learned by Protestants of every description, which teaches them to hate and persecute their elder brethren, the authors of their Christianity and civilization," p. vii. In this short sentence there are several things which require animadversion; but the first and most prominent is the impudent misrepresentation, that this Catechism teaches Protestants to hate and persecute their brethern. I have read it over again and again, and can assure the reader that it teaches no such thing; nor does it contain a syllable that by fair construction can be made to imply that it is right to hate and persecute any man of any sect whatever. With as much truth Dr Milner might have said, that this Catechism teaches treason, and that it recommends the confiscation of the revenues of the church of which its author is a distinguished ornament and zealous defender. My present business, however, is not to defend the doctrine of the Catechism, but merely to expose the falsehood of the vicar apostolic, and the unblushing effrontery that could make such an assertion, when he must have known that any child could detect it.

It is but fair, however, to state the ground on which Dr Milner makes such an assertion; and we have it in the following words:—"In fact, this Christian bishop begins and ends his Protestant Catechism, with a quotation from a Puritan Regicide, declaring, that 'Popery is not to be tolerated, either in public or in private, and that it must be thought how to remove it, and hinder the growth thereof;' adding, 'If they say, that by removing their idols we violate their consciences, we have no warrant to regard conscience which is not grounded on scripture.'" This is a quotation from the great poet Milton, which his lordship gives, in the introduction, and at the conclusion of his Catechism. It is because he has quoted these words, that Dr Milner makes the monstrous assertion above noticed, that the bishop's Catechism teaches Protestants to hate and persecute their brethren. The question is not, whether Milton perfectly understood the subject of liberty of conscience? Perhaps he did not; as few men of his day understood it so well as it is generally understood now; but taking his words in the strongest and most exceptionable sense that they will bear, they imply nothing like that which Dr Milner affects to find in them. They cannot without gross violence be made to imply, that it is right to hate and persecute Papists. The sum and substance of them is that "Popery is not to be tolerated, either in public or in private."

Now though I have always been an advocate for liberty of conscience, and an enemy of persecution for conscience' sake, and hope to continue so to the end of my life, I cannot but express my agreement with the great poet, that "Popery is not to be tolerated," because I believe it is quite intolerable to every man whose religion is derived from the bible; and that it ought to be opposed, and put down, and extirpated by every means by which it is lawful and possible to oppose and extirpate error. Toleration is not a mere negative; it is so far a positive thing, that if we say a thing is tolerable, it implies acquiescence; it is to say, it may be suffered, or endured; it is not necessary to oppose it. Now I say, with Milton, that Popery is not to be tolerated; that no Christian can tolerate it without compromising his Christianity, and becoming a traitor to his Saviour. It ought to be opposed in every way by which error can be successfully opposed: that is, by instruction, by argument, by manifestation of the truth, by the armour of righteousness on the right hand and on the left; and by prayer to God night and day, that he would maintain his own cause, and bless the labours of his servants in the ministry of the gospel. Those who know that Popery, as well as every other system of error, is intolerable, will labour in this way for its extirpation, and I know of no other way by which it can be extirpated.

Now I know well there are men of such perverse minds, that they will apply what I have said of principles to persons—of errors to the individuals who hold them,—and what I have said of extirpation by means of truth and argument, to extirpation by fire and sword. I must therefore tell them again, though I cannot give them a mind to understand it, that the things are quite different and distinct; and that what applies to the one cannot be made available with regard to the other. It is as impossible to convince a man by force as to kill him by an argument. To attempt, therefore, to extirpate heresy or error by fire and sword is as absurd as to punish a murderer by a syllogism. I would never apply force of any kind to extirpate error, while yet I hold that error in general, and Popery in particular, ought not to be tolerated, but extirpated, by the only means which can reach error, which has its seat in the mind, and can be affected only by rational and spiritual weapons.

With regard to persons, I do not say that Papists ought not to be tolerated, neither does Milton in the obnoxious passage under consideration. A Papist may be as tolerable in civil society as another man. Many of them, no doubt, are so, and ought not to be punished on account of their errors. They ought not to have power over Protestants, for their principles would compel them to use such power, not for the extirpation of heresy merely, but of heretics; for they have not learned to make the distinction between principles and persons which I have here laid down. But as members of civil society, without power to injure others, they are tolerable, ought to be tolerated, and are tolerated, in this country as much as other dissenters. I hope I shall never see it otherwise; but as for their errors, idolatries, and superstitions, I hold these to be quite intolerable and insufferable; and wherever they are obtruded, they ought instantly to be put down by truth and argument. If they practise their idolatries in private, they must answer for this, and their other secret sins, to God; we have nothing to do with them, for toleration does not apply to that which is unseen and unknown. But if they were to erect their idols in our streets, and worship them there, I would say, they ought to be put down by the magistrates, as insulting to public decorum, and as tending to a breach of the peace; and though they should plead conscience in such a case, I would say with Milton, it ought not to be regarded, not only because the thing is contrary to the word of God, but because the streets do not belong to them, but to the public; and they have no right to prostitute public property for idolatrous purposes.

It is true, the bishop of St David's prefixes to his Catechism a quotation from Mr Locke, which may imply that Papists as well as Popery ought not to be tolerated. Papists are not specially mentioned, but they may take the passage to themselves if they please; and if they find it excludes them from toleration, it is for a reason which they themselves must approve. The words are:—"These have no right to be tolerated by the magistrate that will not own and teach the duty of tolerating all men in matters of religion." Locke was the great advocate of toleration in the seventeenth century; and I have no doubt his Letters on the subject had no small influence in preparing the minds of men for the tolerant laws established by King William. Indeed, except Dr Owen, I do not recollect any other writer of that age, who so explicitly maintains the principle of toleration, now so universally admitted. It was his very zeal for the "toleration of all men in matters of religion," that led him to exclude Papists from the general rule; because, seeing they would not tolerate others, he thought they could not safely be tolerated. His remark applies to a state of society resembling that of civil warfare, in which the natural principle of self-defence requires and admits of certain rigours not necessary or lawful in other circumstances.

But let the very worst be made of these words of Locke, and of the rest that are quoted from him, they cannot imply that it is our duty to hate and persecute any sect, or any individual. To refuse toleration to those who will not tolerate others, is not persecution, but a just exercise of civil power, like the punishment of other evil doers. But this scarcely applies to the state of things in England and Scotland in the present day, where Papists do practise toleration, because they are without power, and few in number; and the rule of their church, as laid down by Bellarmine, is, that in such circumstances, they ought to be tolerant; and that they ought not to attempt to extirpate heresy by force except where it may safely be done. Thus we tolerate Papists for the very reason why they would not tolerate us; that is—we have power, and they have not.

But there is more objectionable matter in this sentence of Dr Milner's than the misrepresentation which I have pointed out. He speaks as if it were granted that Popery was genuine ancient Christianity;—as if it were indisputable and admitted, that Papists were the authors of our Christianity and our civilization. It would not have occurred to any man of right thinking or feeling, that any creature, angelic or human, was the author of his religion. We know that Jesus Christ himself is the author as well as the finisher of our faith; but Papists seldom, if ever, think of looking so high. They cannot trace their religion to a higher source than some fellow-creature of a saint; or, perhaps, rather a sinner of their own rank; and here Dr Milner roundly asserts, that the AUTHORS of our Christianity are the Papists who happened to live in England prior to the Reformation!

There is nothing in which the bishop of St David's is more successful, and nothing in which any author could desire to be more successful, so far as the evidence of ancient history goes, than his lordship is, in proving that the original Christianity of Britain was not Popery; and that the British Christians of the first six centuries had no more to do with Rome than they had with Jerusalem, or Antioch, or Alexandria, or with the man in the moon, so far as regarded authority on the one hand, and subjection on the other. But Dr Milner, in his introductory address, without invalidating the overwhelming evidence adduced by his lordship on these points, shortly contents himself with re-asserting what has been asserted and disproved a thousand times, that Popery is the "ancient religion;" and that Papists were the "authors of our Christianity and civilization." Here again we have something like the impudence of a petulant boy, who having been reproved for a lie which he had told, after having its falsehood demonstrated, holds up an unblushing face, and tells it over again. Parents and tutors have been subjected to the painful necessity of witnessing such depravity; and so must every man who shall enter into controversy with Papists. It has been proved a thousand times, that their errors are mere novelties, unknown to the Christians of the apostolic age; and yet I suppose no Papist ever wrote a hundred lines on the subject, without asserting that his religion is as old as the era of Christianity.* They hope by this incessant repetition of their lie, to exhaust the patience of Protestants, and so get them to believe it for the sake of peace and quietness: and such is the simplicity of Protestants in general, that there is a probability of their being successful, as they have been with regard to their designation. It was by sheer impudence and perseverance, that they got Protestants to drop the term Papists, and call them Catholics, though they have no more right to that name than the Episcopalians of England, the Presbyterians of Scotland, or the Independents of both kingdoms.

* In my 175th Number, I gave an extract of a letter from a Papist in the Highlands to his son in Glasgow; which, along with some good advice, contained the boasting assertion, that his religion had existed nineteen centuries. There appears no necessity for his having introduced this, unless it be a rule with Papists that it must find a place in all that they write. Having mentioned this subject, I take the opportunity of requesting my correspondent, Z. Malcom, to read that letter over again, with my remarks upon it, and he will find that he is mistaken in supposing that I meant an unfavourable reflection against the people of the Highlands in general. What I said related exclusively to Papists, who are now more numerous in the Highlands than he seems aware of, particularly in the western parts of Inverness-shire, and in some of the islands.

In his postscript, Dr Milner has a little nibbling at the bishop's authorities with regard to the religion of the ancient British ; but he has not adduced a particle of evidence to show that Popery as it is now, and has been for twelve hundred years, in Italy, was professed in this island during the first six centuries. The following statement by Judge Blackstone, prefixed to the Protestant Catechism, remains uncontroverted; and it will readily be admitted that few men were better acquainted with our national history :—"The ancient British church, by whomsoever planted, was a stranger to the bishop of Rome, and his pretended authority. But the Pagan Saxon invaders having driven the professors of Christianity to the remotest corners of our island, their own conversion was afterwards effected by Augustine the monk, and other missionaries from the court of Rome. This naturally introduced some few of the Papal corruptions in point of faith and doctrine; but we read of no civil authority claimed by the Pope in these kingdoms till the era of the Norman conquest."—Comm. B. IV. ch. viii.

It is equally true with regard to Ireland, that Popery is a mere novelty, so far at least as regards subjection to the Pope, and paying him tribute. Ireland is said to have been an island of saints fourteen centuries ago ; but certainly they were not Papists for many hundred years thereafter. For this we have no less than Papal authority, contained in a bull of Adrian IV., inserted in the postscript to the Protestant Catechism ; on which the right reverend author writes as follows :—"The Bull of Adrian IV., in which he gives his consent to Henry the second's conquest of Ireland, on condition of his paying Peter-pence, is a curious and important historical document, and contains indisputable evidence that Popery was not the ancient religion of the Irish,—not the religion of Ireland, before the middle of the twelfth century. If this fact, the modern introduction of Popery into Ireland, were more generally known in that country, it might tend not a little to break that spell, which blinds the eyes of the Irish Papists to the errors of the Church of Rome." Then follows a quotation from archbishop Usher, strongly expressive of the same sentiment. The archbishop had paid particular attention to the state and history of the ancient Irish, and he writes thus: —"As far as I can collect by such records of the former ages as have come into my hands, (either manuscript or printed,) the religion professed by the ancient bishops, priests, monks, and other Christians in this land, was in substance the very same with that, which now, by public authority, is maintained therein against the foreign doctrine brought thither in latter times by the bishop of Rome's followers."

This is perfectly consistent with the fact of missionaries being sent from Rome to Ireland in the fourth and fifth centuries, supposing that to be a fact ; for Rome itself was not then thoroughly papified ; and the fact of receiving the gospel by the preaching of missionaries from Rome did not then imply subjection to the see of Rome, any more than the fact of America receiving the gospel from England implies subjection to the see of Canterbury.

Now the fact is,—Pope Adrian IV. knew that Henry II. of England had a great liking to Ireland, and wished to have it annexed to his dominions. Adrian accordingly issued a Bull authorizing the king to invade and take forcible possession of that island, which he justified and commended by the following reason :—"Your highness' desire of extending the glory of your name on earth, and of obtaining the reward of eternal happiness in heaven, is laudable and beneficial ; inasmuch as your intent is, as a Catholic prince, to enlarge the limits of the church, to declare the truth of the Christian faith to untaught and rude nations, and to eradicate vice from the field of the Lord." Nothing can be more conclusive than this. Ireland did not then belong to the Church of Rome, else the conquest of it could not have tended to enlarge the church. Ireland had not then received the religion of Rome, else the Pope would not have called it an untaught and rude nation. This conclusion is confirmed by several other expressions in the Bull for which I have not room. His lordship gives this curious document in the original Latin, with a translation ; and for its authenticity he refers to a host of great and well known authors ; such as Giraldus Cambrensis, Matt. Paris, &c. ; and there is a translation of it in Rapin's History of England, Collyer's Eccles. Hist. Great Britain, Leland's Hist. Ireland, Lord Littleton's Hist. Henry II. &c. &c.

I have to thank my Cambuslang correspondent, for informing me, that the story of the 6000 sculls of infants, is mentioned by Flavel, in his discourse, entitled, "Tidings from Rome," with much more shocking matter, not fit to meet the eye of a modern reader.

No. CLXXXIII.

SATURDAY, January 12th 1822.

My last Number was occupied chiefly by an exposure of the misrepresentations contained in one single sentence of the introductory address to Dr Milner's "End of Religious Controversy." Were I to do equal justice to every sentence,—were I to expose in detail every misstatement, misrepresentation, quibble, and sophistry, which this book contains, it would occupy the remainder of my life; and the vicar apostolic himself would probably not live to see an "end" of the controversy which his "End of Religious Controversy" had created. It is not my design to go so much into detail; but rather to apply my attention to a few leading principles, which may be called pillars of the great Romish temple; and if I can subvert these, the whole fabric must fall;—I mean, in argument, not in reality, for I believe the final fall of antichrist is not just yet.

I have introduced Dr Milner as asserting that Popery was the Christianity of ancient times; and that to it England was indebted for her Christianity as well as her civilization. This is a main pillar of Popery; yet it cannot stand a breath of such writers as the late Archbishop Usher, and the present bishop of St David's. It is, in fact, demolished by every Protestant writer who attacks it; yet Dr Milner writes as if it never had been touched; and he seems to think he obtains a great triumph when he detects the following paradox in the Protestant Catechism:—"The great and fundamental paradox of the Right Rev. Catechist is, that Protestantism subsisted many hundred years before Popery; at the same time that he makes its essence consist in a renunciation of, and opposition to Popery!" p. xiii. In descending to answer such a contemptible quibble, I feel as if I had returned to the Catholic Vindicator, and his "endless contradictions;" for no doubt, Dr Milner here insinuates that he has detected a contradiction, though it is evident he has performed no such achievement. Allowing the thing to be a paradox, as he states it, it is not a contradiction; for the Protestant religion, though as old as Christianity, in substance, has not existed more than three hundred years under the name of Protestant. The essence of Christianity is, to believe and confess that Jesus died for our sins according to the scriptures, and that he was buried, and rose again, according to the scriptures; yet the apostle Paul said the truth, when he told his hearers, that he taught no other thing than what the prophets had written, hundreds of years before Christ came into the world. Christianity is the old religion of the patriarchs and prophets, under a new dispensation, and a new name; so Protestantism is the religion of the primitive Christians, reformed and emancipated from the errors and the bondage of Rome. It takes its present name from the circumstance of protesting against Romish corruption and idolatry; yet it is essentially the same religion, which under the name, Christianity, spread over a great part of the world, before there was an organized church in Rome; and far longer before any bishop of Rome had the effrontery to put himself forward as universal bishop, and head of the Catholic church.

As an example of the summary manner in which Dr Milner disposes of some fundamental points of the controversy, take the following. He is speaking of the propriety of Papists defending themselves against the attacks of adversaries; and he says,—"It is not only lawful, but also a duty which we owe to our fellow-subjects and ourselves, to repel these charges by proving that there was reason, and religion, and loyalty, and good faith among Christians, before Luther quarrelled with Leo X., and Henry VIII. fell in love with Ann Bulleyn," p. v. Here he undertakes to prove what nobody denies, that good principles and good conduct were always to be found among Christians; though he knows quite well that the question is about Papists; and if he means to use the terms as convertible, he is guilty of the logical vice of begging the question. But what I wish the reader particularly to attend to here, is, the impudent assumption, that the Protestant religion originated from the passions of two men. There is not a word of argument to prove that such was its origin. The vicar apostolic merely mentions the thing en passant, as a thing which all the world knows, and which requires no proof, and yet this very thing, which he tries to pass over as indisputable, is what all the world knows to be a downright falsehood. Luther had no quarrel with the Pope when he began to preach against indulgences, which was the commencement of his reformation. It was the Pope that first quarrelled with him, because he would not forbear exposing the wickedness of the system of indulgences, which had become a scandal to all Europe. It is equally certain that whatever might be the wickedness of Henry VIII. with regard to Ann Bulleyn, or any other woman, the reformation in England did not originate with him. For more than a century, that is, from the time of Wickliffe, the minds of the people had been gradually opening to perceive the abominable superstitions of Popery. They were quite ready to throw off the yoke, before the king was ready to allow them. Had this not been the case, much as the Pope thwarted his designs, he would not have been able to throw the yoke off his own shoulder. He did ultimately effect this; but so far as the reformation of religion was concerned, he was rather a hinderer than a promoter of it. It is not denied that he abolished certain superstitions, and removed many abominations from the established religion; but he retained enough of the "dead fly" of Popery to give a stinking savour to the whole mass of his ecclesiastical system, when his people would have delighted in a more thorough reformation, and cleansing of the church from her filthiness and her idols. If our Papists had a particle of candour, they would take the model of the reformation in England from the reign of Edward VI., against whose moral character they can find no exception; or, at least, from that of Elizabeth, when the church was established nearly as she is now; for I suppose there are none of her sons that defend the procedure of Henry VIII. in toto, or maintain the purity of the church as modelled by him. I have adverted to this subject, not for the purpose of defending the Church of England, but merely to exhibit an example of the manner in which Popish writers disregard historical truth, and the impudence with which they can obtrude falsehood on the world.

But leaving the introductory address, let us attend to the matter and design of the work itself. Dr Milner, in order to put an end to all controversy about religion, conjures up a society of Protestants, all very candid and open to conviction, and willing to be convinced by such arguments as he is able to adduce; and as he had the making of the society as well as of the arguments he found no difficulty in fitting the one to the other. The following is the manner in which he makes his principal creature, "James Brown, Esq. of New Cottage," introduce the subject. It is in a letter to Dr Milner himself:—

"REVEREND SIR,—I should need an ample apology for the liberty I take in thus addressing you, without having the honour of your acquaintance, and still more for the heavy task I am endeavouring to impose upon you, if I did not consider your public character, as a pastor of your religion, and as a writer in defence of it, and likewise your personal character for benevolence, which has been described to me by a gentleman of your communion, Mr J. C—ne, who is well acquainted with us both. Having mentioned this, I need only add, that I write to you in the name of a society of serious and worthy Christians of different persuasions, to which society I myself belong, who are as desirous as I am, to receive satisfaction from you on certain doubts, which your late work in answer to Dr Sturges has suggested to us.*

"However, in making this request of our society to you, it seems proper, Rev. Sir, that I should bring you acquainted with it; by way of convincing you, that it is not unworthy of the attention which I am desirous you should pay to it. We consist, then, of about twenty persons, including the ladies, who, living at some distance from any considerable town, meet together once a week, generally at my habitation of New Cottage; not so much for our amusement and refection, as for the improvement of our minds, by reading the best publications of the day which I can procure from my London bookseller, and sometimes an original essay written by one of the company.

"I have signified that many of us are of different religious persuasions: this will be seen more distinctly from the following account of our members. Among these I must mention, in the first place, our learned and worthy rector, Dr Carey. He is of course of the Church of England; but like most others of his learned and dignified brethren, in these times, he is of that free, and as it is called, liberal turn of mind, as to explain away the mysteries and a great many of its other articles, which in my younger days were considered essential to it. Mr and Mrs Topham are Methodists of the Predestinarian and Antinomian class, while Mr and Mrs Askew are mitigated Arminian Methodists of Wesley's connection. Mr and Mrs Ranken are honest Quakers. Mr Barker and his children term themselves Rational Dissenters, being of the old Presbyterian lineage, which is now almost universally gone into Socinianism. I, for my part, glory in being a stanch member of our happy establishment, which has kept the golden mean among the contending sects, and which, I am fully persuaded, approaches nearer to the purity of the apostolic church, than any other which has existed since the days of it. Mrs Brown professes an equal attachment to the church, yet, being of an inquisitive and ardent mind, she cannot refrain from frequenting the meetings, and even supporting the missions of those self-created apostles, who are undermining this church on every side, and who are nowhere more active than in our own sequestered valley.

"With these differences among us, on the most interesting subjects, we cannot help having frequent religious controversies; but reason and charity enable us to manage these without any breach of either good manners or good-will to each other. Indeed I believe we are, one and all, possessed of an unfeigned respect and cordial love for Christians of every description, one only excepted. Must I name it on the present occasion?—yes, I must, in order to fulfil my commission in a proper manner. It is, then, the church which you, Rev. Sir, belong to; which, if any credit is due to the eminent divines, whose works we are in the habit of reading, and more particularly of the illustrious Bishop Porteous, in his celebrated and standing work, called, 'A Brief Confutation of the Errors of the Church of Rome, extracted from Archbishop Secker's Five Sermons against Popery,' is such a mass of absurdity, bigotry, superstition, idolatry, and immorality, that to say we respect and love those who obstinately adhere to it, as we do other Christians, would seem a compromise of reason, scripture, and virtuous feeling." Pp. 1—4.

* "Letters to a Prebendary, in answer to Reflections on Popery, by the Rev. Dr Sturges, Prebendary and Chancellor of Windsor."

In another long and wordy paragraph, Mr Brown tells the Doctor, that his former work (Letters to a Prebendary) had removed many of his difficulties, and refuted the most odious of the charges brought against the Church of Rome. Some points, however, it seems, had not been cleared up in that work; and Mr Brown, in name of the society, writes to the author, requesting him to undertake the task of satisfying them on these points. In compliance with their request, he wrote this great volume of 525 pages, imperial octavo. It was written, it seems, twenty years ago, that is, fifteen years before its first publication; and suppressed because, as he says, Bishop Horsley, who had obtained some influence over him, and who had praised his "Letters to a Prebendary," in the House of Lords, wished him to suppress it. The reader is thus left to infer, if he pleases, that Bishop Horsley, one of the most powerful writers of his day, considered this work of Dr Milner's so formidable, that it would endanger the established church, and that he begged the author to spare the venerable fabric. This is what is pretty plainly insinuated; and if it be a true state of the case, I must say of Bishop Horsley, what no man ever suspected of him, that he was one of the greatest literary cowards of modern times. But I cannot help suspecting, that the insinuation owes its origin more to the literary vanity of the Popish, than to the literary cowardice of the Protestant bishop.

Creatures of the imagination will in general be found to possess the image of their creator. This is more particularly the case when an author forms an individual or a society after his own heart, and according to his own taste. The society of New Cottage are quite of Dr Milner's creation; and according to their own account, by the pen of their accredited organ, they are all "serious and worthy Christians." This is an epitome of the holy and infallible Church of Rome, which has neither spot nor wrinkle. This they are as a society; and no doubt the author of their existence meant to make them as perfect in their individual characters; but this he could not do, for when we begin to examine them one by one, we find such rank Popish stuff in the composition, as to convince us that the father of lies himself must have had a hand in their formation.

To begin with the "learned and worthy rector, Dr Carey:" he appears in a character the most infamous that can be imagined; and yet I believe it is perfectly consistent with Popish morality. He has subscribed, and professed ex animo, to approve the whole articles of the Church of England. That is, he declares from his heart, with the solemnity of an appeal to the Searcher of hearts, that he believes every doctrine contained in the articles, homilies, and liturgy of the Church of England. With equal solemnity he promises, in the presence of God, to teach the doctrine contained in these articles and homilies, to the people whom God has committed to his charge; and on the understanding that he does so, the law of the land allows him to receive the emoluments attached to his office,—perhaps five hundred pounds a year. But instead of believing the doctrines which he professes to believe, instead of teaching what he has sworn to teach, and for which he receives such a handsome provision he deceives the people committed to his charge, by explaining away, that is, in plain English, denying and subverting the articles of his church! I defy Jesuitism itself to produce a more flagrant example of downright villany. And this is the learned and worthy rector whom Dr Milner is pleased to place at the head of his society of serious and worthy Christians! Truly, he gains nothing by the conversion of such a man to Popery; for he is a Jesuit already; and like persons of that order two hundred years ago, he must have thrust himself into the church for the purpose of effecting her ruin.

I do not profess to be intimately acquainted with the Church of England; but I have read her articles, and some at least of her homilies, and frequently, when I happened to be in England, I have been present at the church service; and I have no hesitation in declaring, that these do contain the true Christian doctrine which Christ himself and his apostles taught,—the doctrine, which, if a man believe, he shall be saved,—and which, if he do not believe, he shall perish. Now if there be within the church such a man as Dr Milner has described, who, eating her bread, lifts up his heel against her, and who, instead of feeding his people with the sound doctrine of the articles which he has subscribed, explains away, or denies the truth contained in these articles, and feeds, or rather poisons them with his own inventions, or the inventions of others, he is a swindler in the worst sense of the word, or what the bible calls a wolf in sheep's clothing. It is not wonderful that such a man should be easily converted to Popery; for among Jesuits only can we find men of his own stamp.

The next couple in the group are, Mr and Mrs Topham, who, it seems, "are Methodists of the Predestinarian and Antinomian class." I am at a loss what to say of this class of religionists; but if I may judge from the designation which Mr Brown gives to this branch of his society of serious and worthy Christians, I would advise him to take care of his plate, and to have all his valuables under lock and key, when he admits them into his house, whether it be for reading, or refection, or simple, silent meditation. Intimate though I have been with Calvinists, who hold the doctrine of predestination, I never met with an Antinomian in my life; and I do not know what it is like, though I have heard that there are such creatures in England. This, if I understand the word, is a creature who believes, or at least professes to believe, that he is not under any obligation to obey the law of God. I know there are thousands of practical Antinomians, who live as if they were under no obligation to obey God's law; just as there are many practical atheists, who live as if there were no God; but as I never met with a man who maintained in theory, that there is no God,—so I never saw a man who would maintain the proposition, that he was not under obligation to obey God's law, or that held the doctrine of predestination in such a sense as to imply this. But perhaps there are such in England; and Dr Milner did right to place a couple of them in the society of persons whom he meant to convert to Popery; for they are already Papists in the worst sense, who think that there is any power in heaven, or earth, or under the earth, that can lawfully dispense with the obligation to obey that law which is holy and just and good; for the honour of which Christ came into the world, and laid down his life; and who did this for the very purpose, not of relieving men from the obligation, but of renewing them to a life of obedience to the law, by infusing a new principle, supplying new motives, and imparting the efficient aid of his Spirit for the purpose of enabling his people to live a life of obedience to the law.

The next couple are "mitigated Arminian Methodists of Mr Wesley's connection." I never heard of mitigated Arminianism before; and as I do not know what it is, I must be excused from dissecting it. The next two "are honest Quakers." I know a good many of the respectable body who bear this name, and I am persuaded they are too honest to spend their time in any sort of religious intercourse with persons of such doubtful principles and character as the rest of the group. The Rational Dissenters, as they presumptuously style themselves, as if all others were irrational, like the Antinomians, are not far from Popery, having nearly met with it in the opposite extreme of infidelity.

Now we come to Mr Brown himself, who, by his own account, is the most inconsistent character of the whole collection. He tells Dr Milner, that not only Dr Carey, but that most others of his learned and dignified brethren, explain away the articles of the church as he does; that is, that most of the clergy of the established church are swindlers and Jesuits, as well as his rector; and he glories in being "a stanch member of this happy establishment," which "approaches nearer to the purity of the apostolic church than any other which has existed since the age of it!" I request the reader to remember that this is a caricature representation by Dr Milner himself, put into the mouth of a pretended friend, but a real enemy of the established religion; and by such trickery does the vicar apostolic form what he calls a society of Protestants, whom he may soon convert into serious worthy Christians, according to the faith of Rome.

This said stanch member of the establishment commences his letter by a few civil words of flattery to our vicar apostolic,—"a sop to Cerberus," to bribe his good humour and avert his growl. And we may form some idea of the vicar's appetite for adulation, by the flavour of what is offered, and the greediness with which he swallows it, from so "worthy" a fraternity. The writer tells him, that "his personal character for benevolence" has been "described to him," and he appears to have intended to ascertain the dimensions of this benevolence, by trying whether it could induce him to accept of praise from a set of people, who unblushingly avow that hypocrisy, barefaced lying, and a contempt of the law of God, are principal ingredients in their composition. I think that even "James Brown, of New Cottage, Esquire," must have been amazed at the vicar's simplicity, in transferring this letter to the pages of his polemical tome, as a certificate of his "benevolent disposition;"—I am sure that no other than a Papist could have had the courage to offer a similar testimonial. He previously informs him, that "it is a heavy task he is endeavouring to impose upon him;" but seeing that Mr Brown and his friends have succeeded in convincing him, that their society "is not unworthy of his attention," they may assuredly take courage,—none of their scruples upon "modes of faith" can be of so stubborn a texture as to occasion the vicar much trouble: I think it probable, however, that he might find it necessary to avail himself of the assistance of the civil magistrate, in teaching them correct "modes of practice."

No. CLXXXIV.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 19TH, 1822.

DR Milner enters professedly on the subject of his work in Letter V. which is entitled, "Method of finding out the True Religion," and which commences thus:—"Dear Sir,—It is obvious to common sense, that, in order to find out any hidden thing, or to do any difficult thing, we must first discover, and then follow the proper method for such purpose." Here, at the very outset, we find this great Romish doctor laying down a principle, as obvious and indisputable, which has no more to do with the subject than the dimensions of a circle have to do with properties of coal gas. He speaks of something that is "hidden," that is to be "found out," which finding out is "difficult," and in order to which, "we must first discover, and then follow the proper method." In his opinion, therefore, religion is an occult science, and the study of it is like the search for the philosopher's stone, or the discovery of a self-moving machine that is to find out the longitude.

Now, I say, this has nothing to do with Christianity, that is, "the true religion" which Dr Milner speaks of "finding out;" for if this depended upon our seeking, or rather upon our first discovering, and then following a way to seek it, it is not probable that ever we should find it. Christianity is not a hidden thing which men are to find out by seeking; it is a published thing which finds out men who are not seeking it, though they may be seeking something which they mistake for it. It consists in the knowledge of the only true God, and of Jesus Christ whom he hath sent. Now this is not by any means a hidden thing, or a thing, the knowledge of which is of difficult attainment. I grant that the attainment of it would be not only difficult, but impossible, if it depended upon human seeking, and human discovery; but Christ tells us plainly,—"God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life. For God sent not his Son into the world to condemn the world; but that the world through him might be saved. He that believeth on him is not condemned; but he that believeth not is condemned already, because he hath not believed on the name of the only begotten Son of God. And this is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil;" John iii. 16—19. This is not a hidden thing which we are to find out by diligent seeking. Christ told it to Nicodemus, —made it known to all his apostles, and commanded them to publish it to the whole world; which they did when they went preaching the gospel to all nations.

I grant that men in all ages have entertained the mistake, that they might do something to find out a religion for themselves. The folly of this is exposed by the apostle Paul, in his epistle to the Romans, chap. x. verses 2—11. Speaking of his brethren the Jews, he says, "they have a zeal for God, but not according to knowledge; for they being ignorant of God's righteousness, and going about to establish their own righteousness, have not submitted themselves to the righteousness of God." They went about seeking to find out a way of approaching to God, different from that which he had prescribed, but which would be more agreeable to themselves. But the apostle tells them, that they had nothing to seek for, or find out, for the thing they inquired about was published, and brought nigh to them, and urged upon them, as a full development of the true religion; and it is this:—"Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth. For Moses describeth the righteousness of the law,—that the man who doeth those things shall live in them. But the righteousness which is of faith speaketh on this wise, Say not in thine heart, Who shall ascend into heaven? that is, to bring Christ down from above; or, who shall descend into the deep? that is, to bring Christ up again from the dead. (What endless seeking this would be!) But what saith it? The word is nigh thee, even in thy mouth and in thy heart; that is, the word of faith which we preach; that if thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved. For with the heart man believeth unto righteousness; and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation. For the scripture saith, whosoever believeth on him shall not be ashamed."

From this passage it is very evident, that the "true religion," that is, the way of a sinner's salvation, is not a hidden thing which the sinner must find out by seeking, but a published notorious thing, urged upon him by the word of God in the scriptures, and by the preaching of the gospel, if he will open his eyes to the one, or his ears to the other; and a thing, of which, in such a country as this, he cannot be entirely ignorant, unless he be of those who love darkness rather than light, and who will not come to the light lest their deeds should be reproved.

But Dr Milner's whole work proceeds upon the assumption that the true religion is a hidden matter. He does not attempt to show that it is so. He assumes it as undisputed and granted, that it is a "hidden thing," yet to be found out; and he proceeds to lay down rules for finding it out, as an astronomer lays down rules for calculating an eclipse, or the revolution of a planet; but unhappily for Dr Milner's system, his rules are not so certain and satisfactory as those of the astronomer.

Now if I have shown, as I hope I have, in few words, that Christianity,—"the true religion," is a revealed, published thing; and seeing Dr Milner builds his whole work upon the false assumption, that it is a secret, hidden thing, I am entitled to say, not merely that I have shaken a main pillar of his system, but that I have swept away its foundation. His great fabric falls to the ground at once; and his whole 525 pages are involved in the ruin of a single sentence; and that the first sentence of the systematical part of the work. All that follows is no better than waste paper; I might very honourably pass it over without farther notice, and without forfeiting my pledge that I should answer the book, for the above is a very sufficient answer and refutation. But I have no wish to dispose of the adversary in so summary a way. His work contains a great deal of curious matter, which will occupy my attention for many weeks; and as I take it to be the standard work of modern Papists in England, at least of the Anti-veto party among them, I consider the exposition of its principles a matter of importance to Protestants, and even to the Papists themselves.

To the above doctrine, however, I anticipate an objection which it is proper to dispose of before I leave the subject:—Is not the true religion that which Solomon speaks of under the name of wisdom? and does he not say, "If thou seekest for her as silver, and searchest for her as for hid treasure, then shalt thou understand the fear of the Lord, and find the knowledge of God?" It doubtless is so; and it is of the true religion that he speaks again, when he says, "get wisdom, and with all thy getting get understanding." But we must connect with this what is said in another passage;—"The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom, and to depart from evil is understanding." The seeking and searching here, do not relate to a thing hidden, or altogether unknown; but to a thing dimly represented under types and shadows: and it was the study of spiritual enlightened men under that dispensation to inquire into, and find out the meaning of, these typical representations. This was to find the knowledge of God, in his characters of goodness and truth, justice and mercy, which were formerly shadowed forth, but now clearly displayed by the incarnation, obedience, and death of his own Son. Respecting these things we are told, that the prophets searched and inquired diligently, when they testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ and the glory that should follow, 1 Pet. i. 10, 11. It does not appear that they understood the full import of the prophecies uttered by themselves, under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit. But they inquired diligently into their meaning, and into the meaning of those rites and institutions which Moses had prescribed; and that which required much inquiry and searching on their part, is as clearly revealed in the New Testament as human language can express it. Thus the apostle Paul says, God had revealed by his Spirit to him, and he had made known to the churches, that of which Isaiah had said;—"Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor hath it entered into the heart of man," 1 Cor. ii. 9, 10. And again he says;—"God hath made known to me the mystery (i. e. hidden or secret things) whereby when ye read ye may understand my knowledge of the mystery of Christ; which in other ages was not made known to the sons of men as it is now revealed to his holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit." Then he proceeds to tell us, that grace was given him to "preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ, to make all men see what is the fellowship of the mystery, which from the beginning of the world hath been hid in God," &c. See the whole passage, Eph. iii. 3—10. Thus, things which were comparatively hidden from the fathers, or even unknown to them altogether, are plainly unfolded to us in the writings of the apostles.

I do not say, there is no part of the word of God, even of the New Testament, that does not require much study and research to find out its meaning; for there are things which no human understanding has yet reached, or is, perhaps, able to reach in this world; but the essence of Christianity,—"the true religion," is not one of those things. It stands conspicuously forward in the discourses of Christ himself, particularly in the third chapter of John's gospel; and in the discourses of Peter and Paul in the Acts of the Apostles; and it meets us in a great variety of expression and illustration in every epistle. It is, that "Christ was delivered for our offences, and raised again for our justification;"—that "he bore our sins in his own body on the tree; that we being dead to sin, should live unto righteousness, by whose stripes we are healed:" and "it is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." Every one of these sentences contains the truth, which if a man believe he shall be saved; but which if he do not believe, he shall without doubt perish everlastingly. There are hundreds of passages in the New Testament equally plain and explicit; and what is thus made known to the sons of men, in language which they understand, cannot be called a secret, hidden thing, that they cannot find out but with difficulty.

We must, indeed, admit the melancholy fact, that there are many to whom this gospel is hid, notwithstanding the clearness of its manifestation; just as there are many to whom the sun in the firmament is a hidden object, because they are naturally blind, or wilfully shut their eyes that they may not see. The apostle Paul tells us of some to whom the gospel was hid, "because the god of this world had blinded their minds, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, who is the image of God, should shine unto them." These are described as not believing the gospel. Their hearts are preoccupied with worldly things, and with the love of sin, which they must abandon, if they receive the gospel; or they are in bondage to carnal ordinances, which they cannot be persuaded to relinquish. This was the miserable condition of the Jews in the days of the apostles; and it is the no less miserable condition of Papists in our own day.

But to proceed with Dr Milner.—He says in the same fifth Letter:—"Before I enter into any disquisition on this all-important controversy concerning the Right Rule of Faith, on which the determination of every other depends, I will lay down three fundamental maxims, the truth of which, I believe, no rational Christian will dispute.

"First, Our divine master, Christ, in establishing a religion here on earth, to which all nations of it were invited, Matt. xxviii. 19. left some RULE or Method, by which those persons, who sincerely seek for it, may certainly find it.

"Secondly, This Rule or Method must be SECURE and never-failing; so as not to be ever liable to lead a rational, sincere inquirer into error, impiety, or immorality.

"Thirdly, This Rule or Method must be UNIVERSAL, that is to say, adapted to the abilities and other circumstances of all those persons for whom the religion itself was intended; namely, the great bulk of mankind.

"By adhering to these undeniable maxims, we shall quickly, Dear Sir, and clearly dicover the method appointed by Christ for arriving at the knowledge of the truths which he has taught; in other words, at The Right Rule of Faith."

The above, the reader will perceive, are proposed, and laid down with great solemnity, as "fundamental maxims," which "no rational Christian will dispute;" and as "undeniable maxims." Yet I am sure, the intelligent reader will see at once, that they are mere gratuitous assumptions, and absurd quibbles and sophistries. Christ did not establish a religion here on earth, or on any spot of the earth, such as Rome, to which all nations were invited to come, and for the purpose of coming to which they required a Rule to know where it might be found; but he commanded his servants to go to all nations of the earth, preaching the gospel to every creature; that is, bringing it home to every man's bosom, with demonstration of the Spirit, and with divine power; and those to whom it thus came, received it, not as the word of man, but as the word of God. So it is still the duty of those who preach the gospel, not to prescribe a rule by which men may find out the true religion, but to make the true religion find out them; that is, bringing home the word of God to their hearts and consciences; for where that word is faithfully preached, it does commend itself to every man's conscience in the sight of God; either by provoking the enmity of the carnal mind by its divine purity, or subduing the carnal mind, and imparting a new mind to the acknowledging of the truth, by its divine energy.

But the sophistry and shuffling of the vicar apostolic appear more manifest in the last of the sentences above quoted, where he says, we may "clearly discover the method appointed by Christ for arriving at the knowledge of the truths which he has taught; in other words, at The Right Rule of Faith." I do not stop to inquire, why it is that he puts the truths which Christ has taught, at such a great distance from the people, that they must arrive at them by a laborious process, such as he describes. I shall direct the reader's attention rather to the Jesuitical artifice, which confounds things that are different, evidently for the purpose of deceiving, or at least bewildering the reader. He says, the truths which Christ taught, are, in other words, the right Rule of faith; meaning it to be understood that the terms are convertible. Now the latter phrase is a piece of Popish manufacture, invented, and constantly used for the purpose of drawing away men's minds from what is meant by the other phrase, namely, the truths which Christ taught. "The right Rule of faith," as we shall see by and by, comprises an immense heap of traditions, to which the truths which Christ taught bear no proportion, in point of quantity, and to which they are directly opposed in spirit and quality; yet in the above shuffling way does Dr Milner attempt to make them pass for the same thing.

So far as I recollect, there is nothing in scripture that corresponds with Dr. Milner's "Right Rule of Faith." The truths which Christ taught are the subject matter of the faith of all true Christians; and the things which he commanded are the rule of their conduct. The former are the things most assuredly believed by us; and the latter are the things most diligently practised by us, if we be indeed his disciples. But a Rule of faith; that is, a rule of believing; and a right rule of believing, which implies that there is a wrong rule of believing, appears to me no better than unintelligible jargon, fit only for the meridian of Popery. The word of God distinguishes between them that believe, and them that believe not; and assures us, that while the former shall be saved, the latter shall perish. The faith of the one, and the unbelief of the other, relate to the same thing; that is, the gospel of the grace of God, which brings salvation to all men, by the free and unlimited invitation of all men to partake of its benefits, which are actually imparted to all that believe; and which are withheld from unbelievers, because they will not have them, but spurn them away, judging themselves unworthy of eternal life. In short, if there be any thing in the bible about faith, that can properly be called a Rule, it is this; "He that believeth shall be saved; and he that believeth not shall be condemned."

Dr Milner having taken it for granted that the finding out the Right Rule of faith is the same thing as ascertaining what is the true religion, proceeds in his sixth Letter to describe three different rules, which he introduces to our notice in the following manner:—"THE FIRST FALLACIOUS RULE OF FAITH. DEAR SIR, Among serious Christians, who profess to make the discovery and practice of religion their first and earnest care, three different Methods or Rules have been adopted for this purpose. The first consists in a supposed private inspiration, or an immediate light and motion of God's Spirit, communicated to the individual. This was the Rule of faith and conduct formerly professed by the Montanists, the Anabaptists, the Family of Love, and is now professed by the Quakers, the Moravians, and different classes of the Methodists." This fallacious Rule leads the vicar apostolic to introduce a variety of topics on which he expatiates at great length, and apparently with extreme delight. He professes at the outset to speak of serious Christians; but it is evident he uses the words in derision, and with a sneer at what he means to represent as serious religion. He fills about fifteen large pages with the most nauseous ribaldry that can be imagined; and with most exaggerated accounts of the extravagances of enthusiasts of various denominations, from the German Anabaptists in Luther's time, down to the late prophetess Joanna Southcote. All this he has been pleased to ascribe to this first fallacious Rule of faith; and he handles the subject in such a manner as to make it appear that Protestantism is chargeable with all the folly and mischief on which he dilates with so much pleasure. He sets one set of enthusiasts a fighting with another; and he stands by, with as much delight and exultation as ever a company of savage villagers enjoyed at a bullbaiting, or the conflict of two game cocks. This is an exercise and a triumph truly worthy of a right reverend bishop and vicar apostolic of the holy Roman church! of one who professes to reconcile all differences, and end all disputes about religion, by ascertaining the right Rule of faith! It would be easy to retaliate, and overwhelm him with confusion if he were capable of it, by a detail of far greater extravagance, folly, and wickedness practised, not by persons whom all acknowledge to have been fools, but by great saints whom the Pope has canonized, and whom Papists at this very day worship with bended knee. I could relate the monstrous extravagances of St Francis, the founder of the Franciscan order, the mad enthusiasm of St Ignatius Loyola, the father of the Jesuits, who thought he was divinely inspired to kill every man who denied the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary; and I could insert the absurd and impious revelations of St Bridget, which are hawked and sold in the streets of Dublin and Cork every day. These are fairly chargeable against the Church of Rome, because she approves of them, and honours and worships those who wrote and did such things; but Protestantism cannot justly be charged with the impieties and absurdities of John of Munster, or Joanna Southcote, because they are disavowed and condemned by the whole body of Protestants, with the exception of a few crazy old men and women, who scarcely know their right hand from their left.

I should, however, think it unworthy of my time and paper, and insulting to my readers, to answer a fool according to his folly in this instance; or to retaliate, by exhibiting the great Romish saints as he has done the poor enthusiasts of the Reformation; for these saints cannot be exhibited in their true characters, or have their extravagance exposed, without laying open such scenes as would make every modest reader throw my work into the fire.

No. CLXXXV.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 26TH, 1822.

IN my last Number, I introduced Dr Milner as laying down certain rules for finding out the true religion. I disposed of his first Rule in a summary manner, as a thing with which I had nothing to do, seeing it related merely to the extravagances of certain enthusiasts whom no sober Protestant acknowledges; such as Joanna Southcote, and John of Munster. I showed also that there was a fallacy in his very enunciation of the subject,—that the true religion was a thing to be found out, whereas it is a thing plainly published to all the world.

I come now to the second of his Rules for finding out the true religion, which he represents as also fallacious; that is, "The written word of God, or the bible, according as it is understood by every particular reader or hearer of it." "This," says he, "is the professed Rule of the more regular sects of Protestants, such as the Lutherans, the Calvinists, the Socinians, the Church-of-England-men." Let. VI. p. 29. I shall take the liberty of dismissing the Socinians, as not belonging to any regular "sect of Protestants" that I know of, and because I know nothing about their Rule of faith, or whether they have any Rule at all except their own reason. Dr Milner introduces them, along with the Lutherans and Calvinists, by way of banter, as he does the Southcotians under his first Rule, in order to make it appear that Luther, and Calvin, and Socinus, and Joanna Southcote, are all upon a par, as acknowledged regular Protestants. This is a very childish trick of his; and any child might retort upon his holy and infallible church, that she nourished in her bosom principles as impious, and encouraged practices as absurd, as any that can be justly laid to the charge of either Socinus or Joanna Southcote, bad as these are.

But what will the reader say, when I have shown, as I shall do presently, that Dr Milner himself is a greater juggler than even Joanna Southcote? She deceived only a few simpletons by her pretended revelations; but here the Doctor attempts to deceive the whole world by a silly sophism, or false representation; and I suppose, the whole world of Papists are deceived by it; for the thing is repeated by every little scribe who undertakes to defend his holy church. It is, that the Protestant Rule of faith is "the bible, according as it is understood by each particular reader or hearer of it." This is what Dr Milner represents as the professed Rule of Protestants. All Popish writers of the present day say the same thing; and the vicar apostolic in this instance may be considered the leader of the faith of his brethren. But it is a piece of barefaced imposition, and downright falsehood, for I must call things by their own names, be the consequences what they may. The Protestant Rule of faith is not the bible according as it is understood by every particular reader or hearer of it. No Protestant church in the world ever professed such a rule; and I never knew an individual Protestant who professed it. Yet all modern Papists take it for granted that it is our only Rule. They argue upon the assumption that it is so; and they draw many absurd conclusions from it, which they attempt to identify with Protestantism, though they are only wicked fancies of their own.

The subject matter of our faith, and the rule of our conduct, is not the word of God as understood by every reader, or by any reader or hearer of it, but the word of God as dictated by his Spirit, and written by his apostles and prophets. This is the perfect standard to which all consistent Protestants appeal. It is not affected by the understanding or the misunderstanding of it by any man or body of men in the world. It is immutable and infallible truth in itself; and as it was meant for the instruction and salvation of men, it is addressed to men in their own language, with sufficient plainness for effecting the purpose intended by it.

I know it will be replied, that it is possible to misunderstand the meaning of scripture, and that, in point of fact, many do misunderstand it. This is true; but it is just as possible to misunderstand any other communication that is made through the medium of words and sentences. Allowing that Romish tradition is of equal authority with the written word, which is the Popish doctrine, is not the language of tradition as liable to be misunderstood as the language of the written word of God? Papists say, no; because, they say, they have the living voice of the church which determines the true meaning of every doubtful passage. But is not the living voice of the church, supposing there were such a thing, as liable to be misunderstood as God's own word, written by his own inspired messengers? I think this can scarcely admit of dispute. The church is composed of men like ourselves, who do not in general possess more knowledge of human nature than other men. Their language may therefore be equivocal, and inadequate to convey the truth with certainty to the minds of other men; but the Holy Ghost, who dictated the scriptures, knows with infallible certainty, what is level to our capacity; and it would be most impious to say that he has not brought down to the understanding of men, what he commanded to be published for the salvation of men.

Here the great question is, How shall man, who is a sinner, escape the punishment of his sins, and be restored to the enjoyment of the favour of God? The whole of Christianity hinges upon the answer to this question; and surely, if the bible does not furnish an answer sufficiently plain and intelligible, it is vain to look for it from any other quarter. The bible tells us, that God himself found out a ransom for us;—that "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life;"—that "Christ died for our sins according to the scriptures;"—that "we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of our sins, according to the riches of his grace." The same thing is brought to view in almost every page of the bible; and if the language is not plain and level to the capacity of any child, let Papists tell us what is plain and intelligible. The fact is, no human language can make the truth more plain than as it stands in the bible; and I never knew any person attempt to make it more plain, without throwing a mist and a darkness about it, more calculated to bewilder than to guide the path of a sincere inquirer after the truth.

But if the truth by which sinners are saved; that is, the truth which constitutes the essence of Christianity, be so plainly revealed in the bible, how comes it, it will be asked, that so many apparently sincere inquirers come short of it, and seem never to attain the knowledge of it? The apostle Paul tells us how this happens:—"The god of this world hath blinded the minds of them that believe not, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, who is the image of God, should shine unto them." 2 Cor. iv. 3, 4. Here it is evident the apostle represents the gospel—the essence of Christianity—as a glorious light shining all around. And why did it not shine into the hearts of all men? that is, why did not all men understand and receive it? It was hid by means of certain things. It was hid from the Jews by their obstinate adherence to the rites of the law of Moses, which were now abolished, as the apostle tells us in the context;—"They could not steadfastly look to the end of that which is abolished, but their minds were blinded; for unto this day remaineth the same veil untaken away in the reading of the Old Testament; which veil is done away in Christ. But even unto this day, when Moses is read, the veil is upon their minds;" 2 Cor. iii. 13—15. Christ took away the veil, so that all who would open their eyes, might see the meaning and consummation of the law of Moses. But they would not open their eyes to the light. Their minds were preoccupied by carnal things. They wanted to have nothing to do with such heavenly and spiritual things as the gospel brought to view, and pressed upon them; and this is ascribed to the influence of the god of this world, by whom their minds were blinded; they were so fascinated by things of a carnal nature, that the light of the glorious gospel of Christ had no charms for them.

The same thing in effect happens to men in general, who, under the influence of a carnal mind, come to read the scriptures. Every thing is strange and foreign to them. They are not merely without ideas on the subject of religion; for if this were the case, they might receive information theoretically correct, as they would do in reading a book of natural science; but they come to the bible with minds preoccupied by religious notions fundamentally and intrinsically erroneous. They do not know the state of their own minds, or so much as suspect that they have received a wrong bias. Instead, therefore, of giving all their former ideas to the winds, and submitting to receive the simple testimony of the Holy Spirit, as it is given in the bible, they strive to reconcile what they find there with their own preconceptions of what should be. This leads them to misunderstand, and to pervert the plainest passages; and thus the god of this world takes occasion from the things which occupy the minds of carnal men to blind them to the truth of the gospel. Every man who receives the divine testimony must become as a little child. This lesson we have from Christ's own lips; and surely nothing can show more clearly that the gospel is a plain and simple thing; and that none shall miss the understanding of it who honestly apply their minds to the subject.

Of all the men in the world, Papists are most apt to mistake the meaning of the divine testimony; for they have not only the vicious and self-righteous preconceptions of the carnal mind to blind their eyes; but they have added to these, the accumulated errors and absurdities of more than twelve centuries, which stand as an insurmountable barrier between them and the plain gospel report. The Church of Rome did not directly obliterate all that Christ and his apostles taught. If she had, it would, humanly speaking, have been much more easy to impress the plain truth of the gospel upon the minds of her children. She accomplished the work of the devil much more effectually, by taking scripture truths and divine institutions, and dressing them up in a fool's coat, which makes the bold infidel laugh, and impresses the ignorant superstitious vulgar with a sort of indefinable dread upon his mind, like that which a heathen feels when he worships a cow, or a monkey, or any other ridiculous idol which his priest has set up. Whenever, therefore, a Papist reads the bible, and has an important truth presented to his mind, his attention is diverted by the recollection of something like that truth which his church inculcates, but which is entirely a different thing; but it is a thing which in his mind has the privilege of occupancy, and the right of prescription. He cannot therefore part with it; but if he has any respect for the bible, and if he wishes to keep his conscience on good terms with it, he will not directly reject what he finds there; but he will labour to reconcile it to what his church teaches him. Having his mind preoccupied by a belief that what the church teaches must be true; and that the church is the sole judge of the meaning of what is contained in the bible; he feels no difficulty in receiving the bible testimony, in the church's meaning, however perverted it may be, and though it should be, as it really is in many instances, directly opposed to the genuine sense of the divine record.

For instance; Christ addresses sinners in these words;—"Repent ye, and believe the gospel;" Mark i. 15. Obedience to this command implies an entire change of mind; and a real turning from sin, to the love and service of God; whose grace is brought to view by the gospel of Christ, which works effectually in renewing unto holiness all who receive it. But these important and comprehensive words —"Repent ye and believe the gospel,"—are presented to every Papist, by his church, in this form:—"Do penance, and recite the belief." This is a mere carnal image of the spiritual doctrine which Christ taught; but it supplies the place of that doctrine; and it diverts the mind from it as effectually, as if it were flatly contradicted, and much more insidiously. To do penance at a priest's bidding, and to the extent which he requires, and to recite the creed, are what any man may do, without the least change of mind, or turning from sin to holiness; and this is in fact the essence of Popery:—it is to make men believe that they are serving God, when their hearts and all that is in them are devoted to the service of the devil.

I have made this digression to show how naturally a mind preoccupied by erroneous notions is led to pervert the plainest passages of scripture. This is no disparagement of the word of God. It is plain enough to those who honestly attend to what it contains; and had the truths of divine revelation been so expressed, that it was impossible for human ingenuity and depravity to pervert or misapprehend them, I suppose an exception against them would have been taken on that account,—that they did not leave men to the exercise of their natural understanding, or to the freedom of their will.

Now if it were true, as Dr Milner says, that the Protestant Rule of faith is the bible as understood by every particular reader, it would infer the absurdity of being a rule, and no rule at the same time. The Doctor, indeed, argues through many a long page as if it were so. He might as well have spent his time in beating the air, or thrashing the water. He is combating what no Protestant church ever believed; but a mere, and a malignant, invention of his own, or borrowed from some other author equally malignant.

While Protestants take the word of God as their rule, in the sense which God intends, and in that sense only, they maintain that every man has a right to read it for himself, and to form his own judgment of its meaning. This is a right which he has, however, merely in relation to his fellow-men. In relation to God, he has no right to form any judgment of his own. He ought to receive implicitly, and with devout gratitude, what God has graciously been pleased to reveal for the salvation of fallen men, and for the rule of their conduct, without presuming to add a thought of his own to the divine communication, or to give a shade of meaning to that communication, different from what the words of it necessarily bear. If he act a different part, he must answer to God for his arrogance and presumption. To man he is not bound to answer, farther than the rights of other men may entitle them to put him away from their communion, if he shall persist in maintaining principles inconsistent with Christian fellowship. This the very nature of religious society admits and requires; but more than this, no church has a right to do with regard to any individual, be his errors what they may. If one is so perverse and presumptuous as to impute his errors to the holy and perfect word of God, it is an aggravation of his guilt; and it seems to be the design of Popish writers in general, and Dr Milner in particular, to urge men on to be guilty of this wickedness, by their insidious misrepresentations of the bible, as if it necessarily led men into error.

But it is time to return to Dr Milner's proposition, That the bible alone is a fallacious Rule of faith. This he attempts to illustrate by means of a number of propositions, of which the following is the first:—"If Christ had intended that all mankind should learn his religion from a book, namely, the New Testament, he himself would have written that book, and would have enjoined the obligation of learning to read it, as the first and fundamental precept of his religion; whereas, he never wrote any thing at all, unless perhaps the sins of the Pharisees with his finger upon the dust, John viii. 6." Such is the impious and presumptuous hypothesis of this right reverend vicar apostolic. If Christ had intended that men should learn his religion from the New Testament, he himself would have written it! It is doubtful if even Tom Paine himself ever made a more impudent attack upon the authority of divine revelation than this. It goes indeed to set aside both the Old and New Testament, with the exception of the ten commandments, which alone were written by the finger of God; and his right reverence could easily, by another stroke of his pen, set these aside too, by pleading, as he does with regard to the apostolic writings, that we have not the autograph, or original copy, written by their own hands. By the above passage from Dr Milner's work, the reader will be reminded of the indignant interrogatories which the Holy Spirit, by the prophet Isaiah, addressed to the idolaters of his day, who seem to have been men of the same spirit, and also guilty of the impiety of saying what the Lord ought to have done:—"Who hath directed the Spirit of the Lord, or, being his counsellor, hath taught him? With whom took he counsel, and who instructed him, and taught him in the path of judgment, and taught him knowledge, and showed him the way of understanding?" Isa. xl. 13, 14. Were such questions addressed to the people of England in the present day, Dr Milner would perhaps step forward, and say, "Here am I, ready to instruct the Almighty!" It is painful to be obliged to put such blasphemy upon paper; but it is really no more than what his words imply. Thus he appears a little antichrist himself; and would be a great one if he could,—exalting himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped.

Dr Milner lays great stress on the fact of Christ's having commanded his apostles to go into all the world and preach the gospel by word of mouth; but an infidel objector might retort upon him in this manner:—"If Christ had intended that all men should learn his religion from preaching, he would have gone himself and preached to all mankind." He might reply;—"We know the fact is otherwise, for he commanded the apostles to go and preach." So we say the fact is against Dr Milner's hypothesis, for we know he inspired his apostles to write the gospel for the instruction of all nations; which fact rests upon the same authority as that of the commandment to go and preach.

After a number of pages of irrevelant matter, our author returns to the same subject in the following terms:—"When I remarked that our blessed Master Jesus Christ wrote no part of the New Testament himself, and gave no orders to his apostles to write it, I ought to have added that, if he had intended it to be, together with the Old Testament, the sole Rule of religion, he would have provided means for their being able to follow it; knowing, as he certainly did, that 99 in every 100, or rather 999 in every 1000, in different ages and countries, would not be able to read at all, and much less to comprehend a page of the sacred writings. Yet no such means were provided by him: nor has he so much as enjoined it to his followers in general to study letters." Page 63. Here again we have the presumption of prescribing what the Lord should or would have done, had he meant the bible to be "the sole Rule of religion." But the argument is of no force unless Dr Milner can show that he knows with infallible certainty what is best to be done. The very giving of the scriptures in the language of men is a proof that Christ intended them for the instruction of men in things which relate to their salvation. He provided also means for their reading and understanding them, when he endowed them with rational powers and promised the aid of his Spirit to guide men into all truth. But the Doctor, it seems, will not be satisfied without the interposition of a miracle, to teach the mechanical art of reading, in which he is as unreasonable as the unbelieving Jews, who, after all the miracles which they had seen Christ perform, still demanded of him a sign from heaven. To say that Christ did not intend the bible to be "the sole Rule of religion," because he did not miraculously teach all men to read, is as absurd as to say, that he did not intend the fruits of the earth to be the food of man, seeing he did not miraculously instruct them in the art of husbandry, and in those other arts by which the implements of husbandry are constructed.

I conclude at present by asking Dr Milner to tell the world, how he knows that Christ "gave no orders to his apostles to write" the New Testament? He will say, he cannot lawfully be called upon to prove a negative; then, I say, he ought not to assert a negative which he cannot prove. We are sure that Christ, after his resurrection, appeared repeatedly to the apostles, and spoke to them of the things concerning the kingdom of God. Acts i. 3. For any thing that we know, the writing of the New Testament was one of those things. But the fact of the case renders argument upon hypothesis quite unnecessary. The apostle John was expressly commanded by Christ to write epistles to seven churches in Asia. Rev. ii. and iii. Besides, when Christ was going away, he told his disciples that he would send them the Holy Spirit, who would guide them into all truth. The Holy Spirit guided and inspired them to write the New Testament, from which we are sure that it was the will of Christ that they should write it, and leave it as their testimony to the world of what they had seen and heard, after they should cease to speak by their living voice.

No. CLXXXVI.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 2D, 1822.

THOSE who have read my work from the beginning will recollect, that on the subject of bible reading, I made large replies to a correspondent in Mr Andrew's Orthodox Journal, who argued, that we could not be sure that any of the books of which the New Testament is composed, were the genuine writing of the apostles; particularly, that seeing the apostle Paul intrusted his epistle to the Romans to a female servant, named Phebe, to be conveyed by her to the Christians in Rome, we could not know whether she had not lost or destroyed the original epistle, and composed out of her own head that which stands in our bibles as the epistle to the Romans. The writer to whom I then replied, was this same Dr Milner himself, the bishop of Castabala, and vicar apostolic of the midland district of England! It is he who makes the above very absurd supposition; and I find in his great work, "The End of Religious Controversy," the identical letters, to which a reply will be found in The Protestant, p. 162, 163, 552, 553.

It is needless to go over the same ground again. The sum of the matter is, the right reverend vicar apostolic maintains the proposition, that the bible alone is not sufficient for our information and instruction in matters of religion. I have endeavoured to show that it is sufficient; and it remains with the reader to judge whether I have established the point. Passing this, therefore, as disposed of already, I shall treat my readers with some curious matter, contained in his ninth letter, which, with remarks upon it, will occupy the remaining part of this Number.

"I have said enough concerning the contentions among Protestants; I will now, by way of concluding this letter, say a word or two of their doubts. In the first place it is certain, as a learned Catholic controvertist argues, that a person who follows your rule cannot make an act of faith; this being, according to your great authority, Bishop Pearson, an assent to the revealed articles, with a certain and full persuasion of their revealed truth: or to use the words of your primate, Wake—'When I give my assent to what God hath revealed, I do it, not only with a certain assurance that what I believe is true, but with an absolute security that it cannot be false.' Now the Protestant, who has nothing to trust to but his own talents, in interpreting the books of scripture, especially with all the difficulties and uncertainties which he labours under, according to what I have shown above, never can rise to this certain assurance and absolute security, as to what is revealed in scripture. The utmost he can say is—'such and such appears to me, at the present moment, to be the sense of the text before me:' and, if he is candid, he will add—'but perhaps, upon further consideration, and upon comparing these with other texts, I may alter my opinion.' How far short, dear Sir, is such mere opinion from the certainty of faith! I may here refer you to your own experience. Are you accustomed in reading your bible to conclude, in your own mind, with respect to those points which appear to you most clear,—'I believe in these with a certain assurance of their truth, and an absolute security that they cannot be false;' especially when you reflect that other learned, intelligent, and sincere Christians have understood those passages in quite a different sense from what you do? For my part, having sometimes lived and conversed familiarly with Protestants of this description, and noticed their controversial discourses, I never found one of them absolutely fixed in his mind, for any long time together, as to the whole of his belief. I invite you to make the experiment on the most intelligent and religious Protestant of your acquaintance. Ask him a considerable number of questions, on the most important points of his religion; note down his answers, while they are fresh in your memory. Ask him the same questions, but in a different order, a month afterwards; when, I almost venture to say, you will be surprised at the difference you will find between his former and his latter creed.—After all, we need not use any other means to discover the state of doubt and uncertainty, in which many of your greatest divines and most profound scriptural students have passed their days, than to look into their publications. I shall satisfy myself with citing the pastoral charge of one of them, a living bishop, to his clergy. Speaking of the Christian doctrines, he says;—'I think it safer to tell you, where they are contained, than what they are. They are contained in the bible, and if, in reading that book, your sentiments concerning the doctrines of Christianity should be different from those of your neighbour, or from those of the church, be persuaded, on your part, that infallibility belongs as little to you as it does to the church.' (Bishop Watson's charge to his clergy in 1795.) Can you read this, my dear Sir, without shuddering? If a most learned and intelligent bishop and professor of divinity, as Dr Watson certainly is, after studying all the scriptures and all the commentaries upon them, is forced publicly to confess to his assembled clergy, that he cannot tell them what the doctrines of Christianity are, how unsettled must his mind have been! and, of course, how far removed from the assurance of faith! In the next place, how fallacious must that Rule of the mere bible be, which, while he recommends it to them, he plainly signifies, will not lead them to a uniformity of sentiments, one with another, or even with their church!" Pp. 76—78.

To the latter part of the above paragraph; that is, respecting the sentiments of Bishop Watson, Mr Grier has made a particular reply; —showing that Dr Milner has been guilty of the usual Popish trick, of omitting a very material clause in the sentence; in which Dr Watson told his clergy very plainly, that he knew what the Christian doctrines were to him, as they appeared in the bible; but he did not wish them to take them upon his authority, but to search the scriptures for themselves. This is certainly very different from declaring that he did not know what the Christian doctrines were, as Dr Milner insinuates.

Yet while I condemn Dr Milner's Jesuitical trick of suppressing part of the sentence in which Dr Watson expresses his sentiments, I must so far agree with him, that the bishop's language, if not the language of doubt, is at least that of hesitation. Dr Watson was neither the most sound nor the most spiritually minded of Christian bishops. From his Theological Tracts, as well as from the account which he has given of himself, in the history of his life, published since his death, I suspect that he really did not know the Christian doctrine in its divine simplicity; because he would philosophize about it, as about every thing else, instead of becoming as a little child, as every one must become who will receive, and really understand the truth of the gospel. The fault was not in the divine word; but in the proud and carnal mind of the self-seeking philosophical prelate, who, in the might of his understanding, would not descend either to receive or communicate instruction by what the apostle Paul calls the foolishness of preaching, the plain apostolic testimony, concerning Jesus of Nazareth. Let Dr Milner make the most he can of such an author, and of all whose faith stands in the wisdom of men, not in the power of God. The Protestant religion can maintain its ground much better without the aid of such men than with it. I mean no disparagement to the popular and useful works of Bishop Watson, in opposition to the infidel writings of Gibbon and Paine, which contain a masterly defence of the Christian revelation; but one may write ably and unanswerably on the subject of Christianity as a whole, while yet his mind refuses to submit to its divine and self-denying truths, when presented in detail. Many a brave man has ventured his life in defending the walls of a city in which he had no inheritance; and it is a melancholy reflection, that many a man of transcendent ability, like Dr Watson, has spent his life in speculating about Christianity as a system, and even in defending the outworks of the city of God, who yet would not descend to taste of the living and life-giving stream that flows in the midst of it.

Passing from this, I come to reply to what Dr Milner says about the doubt and uncertainty which every Protestant must necessarily feel, because he trusts to the bible alone. This Dr Milner thinks he has established beyond contradiction; and he triumphantly adduces the authority of a learned brother of his own, to prove that a Protestant cannot make an act of faith. I dare say few Protestants ever think of such a performance, or so much as know what it is. I shall therefore insert it here, verbatim, from the Douay Catechism, that all my readers may be aware of the mighty achievement, which none but a Papist can perform. "ACT OF FAITH—O great God, I firmly believe all those sacred truths which thy holy Catholic church believes and teaches: because thou, who art truth itself, hast revealed them. Amen." This is the sum total of a Papist's belief; and it is in fact no belief at all, but what almost every heathen believes; namely, that there is one God, and that he is truth itself. To profess to swallow in the lump all that the Catholic church believes and teaches, does not imply, much less does it express, a belief in any one doctrine; for it does not so much as imply a theoretical knowledge of any doctrine or fact on which Christianity is founded, except the being of God and his character of truth. This is the vast advantage which the Church of Rome possesses over Protestants; namely, certainty as well as unity of faith. But in this respect Mahomedans have the advantage of Papists; for their act of faith is more simple: it is expressed in nine words—"There is one God, and Mahomet is his prophet." Dr Milner and all Popish writers boast, that in every part of the world you will receive the very same answer from a Catholic, when you ask him about his faith; but as the same happens with every Mahomedan, it proves nothing in favour of the Church of Rome. It rather excites a suspicion that she is very nearly allied to the false prophet of the east; for both alike deprecate the impertinence of the common people being more particular in their belief, or inquiring into their religion in detail.

I have seen somewhere a Papist highly commended for the following discreet answers to certain questions about his faith. Quest. "What do you believe?" Ans. "I believe what the church believes." Q. "What does the church believe?" A. "The church believes what I believe." Q. "Well then, what is it that both you and the church believe?" A. "We both believe the very same thing." It was impossible to get more out of him, for there was no more in him. He knew no more about Christianity than a Hottentot before the missionaries went to Africa, except, indeed, that he bore the name of Christian, which only increased his guilt, and would make his condemnation more dreadful than that of any mere heathen. The monstrous wickedness of the Church of Rome appears here in a very striking light. She takes the bible declaration, that if a man believe not he shall perish; which in the bible refers to the truth of the divine testimony about Jesus Christ as the only Saviour of sinners, which is the only thing which connects a man's believing with his salvation: but instead of presenting the divine testimony to men for belief and salvation, as the apostles did, and as consistent Protestant teachers do, the Church of Rome presents herself, and herself alone, to be believed in, under the penalty of eternal damnation; for this and nothing else is the import of the "act of faith," which she teaches all her children to make—"I firmly believe all those sacred truths which thy holy church believes and teaches." By repeating this to himself with suitable seriousness of mind, a Papist is deceived into a confident persuasion that he is a believer and a true Christian in the bible sense of the words; while in reality he believes nothing at all upon divine authority; and is, therefore, as destitute of that faith which is connected with salvation, as those who never heard of a Saviour, or even those who, having heard, reject him. A deceived heart turns such persons aside from the only method of salvation. They incur the curse pronounced against the man that trusteth in man; but to the church and her false teachers, belongs the greater condemnation.

This is the boasted certainty of the Church of Rome, as opposed to the doubt and uncertainty of Protestants. It is the certainty of falsehood, if the reader will allow a seeming contradiction; for there is such a thing. It is possible to believe a lie with a full assurance of its truth; which was no doubt the case with Eve, when her faith in the serpent effected the ruin of the world. So when one has been persuaded to receive implicitly the word of a fellow-creature, or of any company of fellow-creatures, called the church, with regard to matters of divine revelation, he may feel fully assured of the truth of that which will eventually prove a lie. This is particularly the case of those who have had the truth of the gospel presented to them, but who did not like it. "Because they received not the love of the truth that they might be saved; and for this cause God shall send them strong delusions, that they should believe a lie; that they all might be damned who believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness," 2 Thess. ii. 10—12. From the connection of the passage, there is an evident reference to the wicked one, who came with signs and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness, which very plainly points out the character of the Church of Rome.

In reply to what I have said about the general, unmeaning profession which is made in their "act of faith," I shall be told that in her catechisms the Church of Rome lays down and explains every article in the apostles' creed, the ten commandments, the seven sacraments, &c. It is true;—but still in such a way, that the common people must receive all these things in the sense which the church imposes, and in that sense only, so that they are not articles which any one believes upon his own conviction; for if they were to think, and examine, and reason about them, their boasted unity and certainty would soon be at an end; and they would exhibit as great variety of sentiment as Protestants do; which is in fact the case among the learned of the Church of Rome, with whom there is not, and never was, more unity of sentiment than among their neighbours.

According to Dr Milner, the matter comes shortly to this point:—Papists have no doubts with regard to the truth of their religion, because they believe the church;—Protestants have no certainty of the truth of their religion, because they believe the word of God. Let Papists shuffle as they please, this is the issue to which they must come at last. I perfectly agree with Archbishop Wake, whose words Dr Milner has quoted:—"When I give my assent to what God has revealed, I do it, not only with a certain assurance that what I believe is true, but with an absolute security that it cannot be false." I am here entitled to assume as admitted, that the holy scriptures are the word of God; for that is not directly denied by Dr Milner; nay, he tells us, (Let. XI. p. 112) that "Catholics, believing in the tradition of the church as a divine rule, are enabled to believe, and do believe in the scriptures, with a firm faith, as the certain word of God." Nothing of the nature of certainty can exceed that with which I regard the divine record; that is, every truth and fact contained in the bible. I doubt many things which the Church of Rome teaches, because they are supported by mere human testimony; I deny many others, because they are opposed to the divine testimony; but I cannot, without renouncing sense and reason, as well as religion, entertain a doubt of any thing which God has revealed.

Yet Dr Milner does not hesitate to make the following absurd remark on Archbishop Wake's words:—"Now the Protestant who has nothing to trust to but his own talents, in interpreting the books of scripture, especially with all the difficulties and uncertainties which he labours under, according to what I have shown above, never can rise to this certain assurance and absolute security, as to what is revealed in scripture." In reply to this, I remark, first, that the Protestant puts no trust in his "own talents," in reference to what is here supposed. His trust is in the faithfulness of God, who will tell him nothing but the truth; and in the goodness of God, who will tell that truth, and who has told it, in language level to the meanest capacity. Secondly; "interpreting the books of scripture" is not a work to which men in general are called; and it has no necessary connection with the belief of the gospel, by which alone sinners are saved, and constituted Christians in the bible sense of the word. That which is perfectly plain and intelligible requires no interpretation; and that this is the character of the gospel record is experienced by all who receive it. It is a revelation of mercy to sinners deserving to perish. It comes from the Father of mercies as a proclamation of pardon, and peace, and reconciliation, to the very chief of sinners. It tells them that for the sake of Christ's obedience and sufferings, God will pardon any man, and every man, who will take the benefit of this general proclamation of pardon; that is, every man who believes what is thus brought to view, and urged upon him in the word of God. Those who believe enjoy the benefit of it in their own personal salvation; they rely upon its truth with infallible certainty; and by the fruits of the Spirit they have a witness in their own hearts, that that word must be true which has turned them from sin to holiness; and which, instead of anxiety and dread of a judgment to come, has given them the peace of God, and the assured hope of a blessed immortality. Here is an evidence and an assurance which is altogether unknown to those who receive their religion on mere human authority, though it be the authority of a body that impiously calls itself the "Holy Catholic Church."

Suppose the case of a man condemned to death for certain crimes against the state; and suppose the king, influenced by certain considerations, to grant a pardon, and cause the same to be intimated in the usual terms; does any one imagine that, in such a case, the poor criminal would not be able to understand, or to take the benefit of such a message, because he had not talents to interpret all the statutes of the realm, or even the law relating to the royal prerogative of which he enjoyed the benefit? Certainly the criminal to whom the pardon came, would find the message of mercy plain enough. He would take the benefit of it; and he might study the laws and their interpretation afterwards if he pleased. Now, it is impossible for the king, or his secretaries of state, to draw up the terms of a pardon to a condemned criminal, in language more plain and explicit than Christ and his apostles have published the proclamation of mercy to sinners. For the truth of this I appeal to all who have been really convinced that they are sinners, such as the word of God describes all men to be by nature and practice, and who have taken the benefit of the proclamation of mercy. I mean all who believe the gospel; in receiving which they had not to interpret a doubtful message, but to submit to what proved itself to be of God by its suitableness to their case, and its bringing that relief which none but God could give.

Dr Milner, and all such writers, and worldly men in general, do, however, refuse their assent to such doctrine as this. They are confounded by its very plainness and simplicity. And the reason is, they do not consider themselves such sinners in God's sight, as to resemble the condition of a condemned criminal; and, therefore, they cannot comprehend what a proclamation of mercy has to do with them. As I am not conscious of having done any thing to subject me to death by the laws of the land, if a message were to come to me from the king, under the great seal, bearing that he had been graciously pleased to remit the sentence of death upon certain considerations, I would probably say there was some mistake here—that I was not the person intended; and if any one would insist upon it, that I was the very person, I would be unable to understand what was meant, and would probably feel deeply offended. Now this is the very reason why the gospel message is so generally misunderstood. It takes for granted that those whom it addresses are condemned criminals in the sight of God, on account of their manifold transgressions. To those who are not really convinced that such is their condition, the gospel will ever be unintelligible, and, in general, offensive. Popery promises to save men in a way more palatable; but the day will declare how many millions she has thus seduced to their everlasting perdition.

No. CLXXXVII.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 9TH, 1822.

THE grand art by means of which Dr Milner succeeds in bewildering and deceiving his readers, is to present one thing to their minds as an important subject of discussion, and then to make all his discussion relate to another and a quite different thing. It requires no small degree of art to do this dexterously; and few men but such as have been bred in the Jesuit school can do it to purpose. The "true religion" is what Dr Milner proposes as the subject of his writing; and his professed object is to show how this may be found out. He takes care, however, not to tell his readers, that the true religion is the knowledge of that by which a sinner is saved, and taught how to serve God acceptably; for this is expressed in few words, and exhibited in almost every page of the word of God, in language level to the capacity of a child, as I hope I have proved in my late Numbers. But all Dr Milner's discussions, for I cannot call them arguments, relate to something entirely different; and to something so general and undefined, that no man can say what it is, except that it is what "the Catholic church believes and teaches."* We may perhaps guess at what he means from what he says about the doubts and uncertainty of Protestants. In an extract which I gave in my last Number, he lays it down as an indisputable fact, that Protestants are certain of nothing in religion: and this may be true of such Protestants as he condescends to converse with, and of such as choose to spend their time conversing with him. In a country where the Protestant religion is established, the name indicates no more than external conformity to the established religion, or to that of such as are called Protestant dissenters. In many instances it does not indicate even so much; for many are called Protestants who do not even externally conform to the rites of either the established worship, or of any mode of separation from it; many who, in short, do not believe in revealed religion; but who are content to be called Protestants, merely that they may not be taken for Papists. It is needless to expect that such men should be certain of any thing; and it is a very common Popish trick to set down their doubts and scepticism to the account of Protestantism. The infidelity of such is quite inexcusable upon any Christian, and upon any Protestant principle; but for every religious purpose, it is just as good as Popish faith; I mean, the implicit belief of any thing that the church teaches upon her own authority: and with all the other crimes which the Church of Rome has to answer for, I am persuaded a dreadful account stands against her, on the ground of the many infidels she has made by her impious caricature of Christianity.

But there is a larger class of nominal Protestants, who take the name merely because it designates the established religion, or that of the sect in which they have been brought up. The former believe in the Protestant religion because it is the established one, and, perhaps, the latter believe it for the very opposite reason,—that it is not established. The traditional faith of the one is no better than that of the other; and as they have not made the true religion a matter of personal interest, they are almost as ignorant of what it really is, as any Papist can be. He who makes religion a personal matter, and who really believes the truth which brings peace and salvation to his own soul, knows with infallible certainty what that truth is; and if he were asked questions about it every day of his life, he would give substantially the same answers. But Dr Milner takes care never to bring this fact to view; and, to do him justice, I believe he does not know that there is such a thing. He has no idea of a man resting with entire confidence upon the bare word of God; though this was the only thing that supported the mind of an apostle when about to be put to death for the faith which he believed and preached:—"I know whom I have believed, and that he is able to keep that which I have committed to him against that day."

* This is what in Italy is called fides Carbonaria; that is, the collier's faith. The person mentioned in my last (p. 759.) as making the truly Catholic profession, "I believe what the church believes," &c. was, it seems, a collier, and this gave the designation to that most perfect kind of implicit faith, which certain great Romish doctors consider the sum of necessary and saving knowledge in a Christian. See Campbell's Lect. Eccl. Hist. Lect. XXIII. In this lecture implicit faith is traced to its source and exposed in a masterly manner.

I suspect that Dr Milner has seldom if ever come into contact with Christians of this description; for if he had, he would have found them perfectly certain, and unanimous in the profession of their faith, which is not a mere system of speculative opinions, sound or unsound, not a mere agreement in the understanding of a few doubtful passages of scripture; but an entire submission of mind and heart and conduct to the will of God, as plainly made known by the general tenor of his word. This, I say again, is the true religion as it exists in those who believe the gospel, that is, who are Christians in the bible sense; and I would like to hear what Dr Milner can object to the proposition.

He endeavours, however, throughout his whole work, to make the true religion appear something very different from this. With him it is a system of opinions and dogmas, which a man must believe upon the authority of the church, without presuming to think differently upon any of them from what the church is pleased to dictate. "The faithful," that is, all good Papists, submit to these conditions; and thus they are all agreed, and all undoubtedly certain of the infallibility of their creed. Taking it for granted that the faith of Protestants rests upon a similar foundation, and that their religion is no better than a system of opinions, Dr Milner thinks he obtains a great triumph when he finds a difference of opinion among Protestants; and when he finds that the same persons are not always of the same mind, even with regard to the same things. Hence the silly cavil contained in a quotation which I gave in my last Number:—"The utmost he (a Protestant) can say, is, 'such and such appears to me, at the present moment, to be the sense of the text before me;' and if he is candid, he will add, 'but perhaps, upon further consideration, and upon comparing these with other texts, I may alter my opinion.' How far short, dear Sir, is such mere opinion from the certainty of faith!" This is the way in which the vicar apostolic glides away from the subject, and bewilders his readers. The question is, What is the true religion? and had he proved that Protestants were necessarily uncertain of this, he would have done something to serve the cause of Popery. For instance, had he put the question to a Protestant thus:—"You know you are a transgressor of God's holy law, and that you deserve everlasting damnation; how do you expect to escape the punishment which your sins deserve?" If the Protestant had replied:—"My present opinion is, that Christ died for the ungodly such as I am, and that I hope to be saved through him; but perhaps, upon further consideration, I may alter my opinion." If, I say, Dr Milner were to find this the current language of Protestants, I should agree with him, that there was here not only no certainty, but no faith. This, however, is not the language of any one who believes the gospel. "I KNOW whom I have believed," is the triumphant language of the man who relies upon the "faithful saying" of him who cannot lie: and though the devil and his agents on earth may perplex and tempt him, it is not in the power of both united to shake him from this foundation.

But Dr Milner's triumph proceeds upon the supposition that a Protestant may not be sure of the meaning of certain texts; and that though he has his mind made up about them for the present, he may see cause to alter it upon obtaining further information. What is there in this that may not happen to any honest man; and which must have happened to Dr Milner himself, if ever he read the bible, and presumed to exercise a thought about what he read? The question is not about the truth of what God has revealed, for of that no Christian entertains any doubt: it is merely about the meaning of certain texts which he has not been pleased to reveal very clearly, and the perfect understanding of which is not necessary for our future salvation or present comfort. For instance, it is a question among Protestants, and, I suppose, among Papists too, who Melchisedec was. I have my opinion at present; but I may see cause to alter it; and so I suppose every man will say, that reads what is said of him in the Old and New Testament, and who spends an hour in thinking about it. But this implies no doubt, or uncertainty, or want of faith; for the question does not relate to a matter of faith, seeing it is not revealed. That Melchisedec was an illustrious type of Christ is plainly revealed. Of that, therefore, I have no doubt; but who, and of what family he was, is not revealed, and I am not required to believe any thing about it. I may have one opinion to-day, and another to-morrow, without indicating any doubt or uncertainty about any fact or doctrine of divine revelation. The same remarks will apply to other passages of scripture; especially with regard to the meaning of prophecies not yet accomplished; and because Protestants are not all of one mind with regard to such things; and because individuals may see cause to change their opinion, and give one answer to a question now, and a different one a month hence, Dr Milner, in his profound wisdom, comes to the certain conclusion that no Protestant can be sure of what he believes.

I grant that among Protestants there are differences of opinion upon very important subjects; and that even among those who are agreed in their views of Christian doctrine, worship, and practice, there are various degrees of clearness of apprehension of divine truth, as well as of steadfastness in maintaining, and zeal in propagating it; yet all who believe the divine truth on the footing of the divine testimony, are substantially of the same mind with regard to it; for as it is one in itself, it is uniform in its effects. It produces peace of mind, love to God and man, and holiness of heart and life, whatever be the external form of the church or churches to which they belong. I do not say, that in this respect Protestant churches are all alike agreeable to the word of God; or that the order and worship of all are alike calculated to edify, and promote the other ends of Christian fellowship; but differences in this respect do not break the spiritual union of all who believe in Christ, in different churches, any more than difference of temper, and different degrees of knowledge, break the union of individuals in the same church. In short, all who receive the truth as revealed in the bible, speak of it in the same manner; it teaches them to pray for the same things; with regard to the essence of Christianity they are perfectly of one mind; and they are so in consequence of every one's own personal conviction of the truth which has brought salvation to himself in particular. Thus, to use the language of the New Testament, they are all one in Christ; which is certainly a more glorious union than that of Papists, which, by their own account, is merely being one in the church. Theirs is not a union in faith from a conviction of the truth of Christ's word; but a mere carnal image of unity in the implicit belief of what the church teaches, without any more personal conviction of the truth of what they believe, than if they had no personal interest in it.

But, after all, the thinking and reasoning part of the Church of Rome have not even this carnal image of union. It is only the ignorant vulgar that enjoy this happy privilege; for the learned are as little agreed in sentiment as the same class in any other communion; of which the most abundant evidence is to be found in the long continued warfare between the Franciscans and Dominicans, and the Jansenists and Jesuits; besides the endless skirmishing of innumerable smaller bands; and it was part of the cunning policy of the court of Rome to encourage and keep alive dissensions among the principal orders, that no one might gain so much strength as to be able to contend with the "Head of catholic unity," who connived at every species of hostility among his children, provided they maintained their allegiance to him.

On this subject I shall adduce an authority, which, I am sure, Dr Milner will not reject; that is, the authority of his own great self, in reference to what may fairly be considered a fundamental article of Popish belief; namely, the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary. "The church," says he, "does not decide the controversy concerning the conception of the blessed Virgin, and several other disputed points, because she sees nothing absolutely clear and certain concerning them, either in the written or the unwritten word; and therefore leaves her children to form their own opinions concerning them." Letter XII. p. 129. Here it is admitted, that, notwithstanding the infallibility of the church, there are several disputed points which she cannot determine. What advantage then has she over other churches who lay no claim to infallibility? But what I advert to here is an article of vital importance, which Dr Milner tells us the church cannot, at least does not, decide; that is, "the conception of the blessed Virgin." Now, surely, if the church has the power of deciding any thing it ought to be a matter of such immense importance. It is well known that the Virgin Mary is an object of worship throughout the whole Church of Rome, next to the sacred Trinity. There are several devotional writers that place her upon an equality at least with Jesus Christ, and some that exalt her above him; but I shall not ground my remarks upon the horrible and impious extravagances of certain "holy saints," whom even Dr Milner would blush to acknowledge. I shall state his own faith on this subject; and then show how cruel a mother the Church of Rome is, seeing she leaves so dutiful a son in a state of uncertainty with regard to the original purity of this object of his devout invocation. Addressing his intended convert, James Brown, Esq. he says:—"You believe also that, among the saints of God, there is one of supereminent purity and sanctity, pronounced by an archangel* to be, not only gracious, but full of grace; the chosen instrument of God in the incarnation of his Son, and the intercessor with this her Son, in obtaining his first miracle, that of turning water into wine, at a time, when his time for appearing in the world by miracles was not yet come. John iii. 4. It is impossible, as one of the fathers says, to love the

* I suspect Dr Milner is here guilty of falling into an error in which he has the countenance of many Protestants. Where does he find in Scripture that the heavenly messenger who came to Mary is called an archangel? or where does he find this title given to any creature? There is only one to whom the title is given; and he is styled emphatically THE Archangel; meaning, no doubt, the Lord of angels. The "voice of the Archangel" is evidently the same thing as "the trump of God," 1 Thess. iv. 16.

Son without loving the mother; beg then of her, with affection and confidence, to intercede with Jesus, as the poor Canaanites did, to change the tears of your distress into the wine of gladness, by affording you the light and grace you so much want. You cannot refuse to join with me in the angelic salutation: 'Hail, full of grace, our Lord is with thee;' nor in the subsequent address of the inspired Elizabeth: 'Blessed art thou among women, and blessed is the fruit of thy womb.' Luke i. 42. —Cast aside, then, I beseech you, dear Sir, prejudices, which are not only groundless, but also hurtful, and devoutly conclude with me, in the words of the whole Catholic Church upon earth: holy Mary, mother of God, pray for us sinners, now and at the hour of our death. Amen." Letter XXXIII.

Here Dr Milner tells us enough to let us see that he believes the Virgin Mary to be omnipresent and omniscient, seeing the whole Catholic Church addresses prayers to her, which prayers she hears and answers, and procures the tears of distress to be turned into the wine of gladness to those who devoutly call upon her. Yet he says the church has not determined the question of the conception of this one who hears prayer from all the ends of the earth; that is, whether she was really born in sin like other women; or whether she was not favoured with a special exception from the moral pollution which attaches to the rest of the human race. Now it is certain that a great part of the Church of Rome believe, and stoutly maintain, that she was born without sin, as really as Jesus was; and that in order to her bearing him without sin, it was absolutely necessary that the same should have happened to herself. This is a fundamental article of faith with the Franciscans, though denied by the Dominicans. The original Jesuits agreed with the Franciscans; but their faith in general is what suits them best to avow where they happen to reside; and where it is not convenient to make an explicit declaration of what they believe on this point, they escape by saying, like Dr Milner,—the church has not determined it.

But why has she not? It is surely a matter of more importance than fifty things which she has determined. If the Franciscan doctrine be true, it leads to some very strange consequences. If, in order to bearing the Saviour without sin, it was necessary that Mary should have been also born without sin, then, in order to the bearing of her, it was necessary that her mother should have had the same privilege; and indeed the worshippers of St Ann are not far from asserting this; (see No. 39.) and then the mother of Ann must also have been born without sin; and thus we shall get up to Eve herself, and arrive at the conclusion, that before she committed sin, she had a daughter who was the mother of a race of sinless women from whom the holy virgin descended. Thus the doctrine goes to set aside the whole scriptures; and yet Dr Milner gravely tells us, that the church "sees nothing absolutely clear and certain" on this point, "either in the written or unwritten word of God," and therefore she has determined nothing about it. It is time then that she had done with the boasted certainty and unity of her faith, when she cannot so much as tell, whether the object of the daily prayers of her devout children was, or was not, born in sin like themselves.

Among the mendicants in Spain and Portugal, the immaculate conception is believed more firmly than any article of divine revelation. They have a book of three folio volumes on the subject, said to have been written by a nun, mother Mary of Agreda, to whom the Virgin appeared almost every night, and told some story of her own history, of which her immaculate conception, of course, bears a prominent place. "This book," says the author from whom I quote, "is still looked upon by the natives of both Spain and Portugal, as an immediate inspiration of the Holy Ghost, and I have heard them call it a thousand times, un libro divino."—"I have seen it, and even undergone the drudgery of reading it quite through."—"As I was reading these heavenly visions, a Dominican friar of my acquaintance chanced to enter the room: I asked his opinion of them, though I pretty well knew beforehand what answer he would give; he replied, with indignation in his countenance, that they were nothing but a heap of old wives' tales; and advised me as a friend not to waste my time in reading such trash. Now you must not imagine from these expressions, that the Dominicans are less bigots, or less adorers of our lady, than the Franciscans, except in the point of her immaculate conception, which happens to clash with the sentiment of their angelical doctor, Aquinas; for, as to the rest, they maintain that she was as free from actual sin as Christ himself."—"Not long after this, a Franciscan chanced to pay me a visit, and found me in the same employment. The moment he cast his eyes on the book, he ran to it and gave it a most devout kiss; assuring me that every word in it was as true as the gospel; to which he added, with a heavy sigh, that the Dominicans were a pack of wicked wretches, for attempting to depreciate so inestimable a treasure." A fine specimen of the unity that exists in the "one holy Catholic church!"

"When these divine revelations made their first appearance at Rome, they were judged by the Pope to be so excessively absurd and ridiculous, that he published a decree to prohibit the reading of them. This put the Spanish mendicants in such an uproar, that they stirred up the whole kingdom, and prevailed so far by their clamours and remonstrances, that the king himself was induced to interpose in favour of a book they had spent so many years in composing (for it was they who had inspired the nun). At this prince's request the Pope suspended his decree; and though he did not think it prudent to confirm these visions by his apostolic authority, yet by a second decree, he permitted the faithful to read them for their private edification; which concession the people of Spain and Portugal have made so good use of, that few families are to be found without them." See Authentic Memoirs concerning the Portuguese Inquisition, Letter XII. London, 1761.

No. CLXXXVIII.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 16TH, 1822.

DR MILNER argues that while Protestants must ever be agitated with doubts with regard to the truth of their religion, Papists are perfectly at ease, because they rest with implicit confidence in the truth of what the church teaches. In my last Number, I endeavoured to show that this was a vain boast;—that while all who really believe the word of God are certain of what they believe, and substantially of the same mind with regard to it, those who implicitly believe the church without a personal conviction of the truth of what is told them, possess no more than a dead image of union and certainty; and that the learned among them do not possess even so much; for there are as many disputes among them as among Protestants. This is a fact known to all the world, though perhaps Dr Milner would have denied it, if he had not found it convenient to tell the English Papists, that whatever their brethren in Spain believed about the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary, they were at liberty to believe what they pleased. Nay, though the bible tells us plainly, that of the race of Adam, born in the ordinary course of nature, there is none righteous, no, not one; that all have sinned and come short of the glory of God; the Church of Rome, clear-sighted as she is, cannot see any thing in the written or unwritten word of God to determine, whether or not the Virgin Mary was born in sin. They admit that she died; but whether she died on account of sin, or on some other account, the holy and infallible church cannot tell! There is not a Protestant child who has received the first lessons of religious instruction, that could not answer this question, which has baffled the Pope, and cardinals, and Dr Milner himself; and yet they are the people who alone possess the prerogative of being infallibly certain of every article of faith!

But it is time to proceed to Dr Milner's concluding and strongest argument, to prove how certain Papists are of the truth of their religion, while we have no certainty with regard to ours. It is at the conclusion of his ninth letter; and it runs thus:—"There can be no doubt, Sir, but those who entertain doubts concerning the truth of their religion, in the course of their lives, must experience the same, with redoubled anxiety, at the approach of death. Accordingly there are, I believe, few of our Catholic priests in an extensive ministry, who have not been frequently called in to receive dying Protestants into the Catholic church, while not a single instance can be produced, of a Catholic wishing to die in another communion than his own. O Death, thou great enlightener! O truth-telling Death, how powerful art thou in confuting the blasphemies, and dissipating the prejudices of the enemies of God's church!" Part I. p. 79. There are two notes appended to this paragraph, containing many great names, said to have been converts from Protestantism to Popery, among whom we find Anthony Ulric, Duke of Brunswick.

In his eleventh letter Dr Milner treats us with more to the same purpose:—"The same method which God has appointed to keep peace in his church, he has also appointed to preserve it in the breasts of her several children. Hence, while other Christians who have no Rule of faith but their own fluctuating opinions, are carried about by every wind of doctrine, and are agitated by dreadful doubts and fears, as to the safety of the road they are in; Catholics, being moored to the rock of Christ's church, never experience any apprehension whatsoever on this head. The truth of this may be ascertained by questioning pious Catholics, and particularly those who have been seriously converted from any species of Protestantism. Such persons are generally found to speak in raptures of the peace and security they enjoy in the communion of the Catholic church, compared with their doubts and fears before they embraced it. Still the death-bed is evidently the best situation for making the inquiry. I have mentioned in a former letter," &c. referring to the quotation given above,—a challenge "to the whole world, to name a single Catholic, who, at the hour of death, expressed a wish to die in any other communion than his own." p. 115.

The above extracts excite a number of reflections which will occupy the remainder of this Number. It seems there are few priests of the Romish church, "in an extensive ministry, who have not been frequently called in to receive dying Protestants into the Catholic church." On this subject, my doubts are stronger than my faith; and I call upon Dr Milner for a proof of his assertion. I have it declared by Bishop Cameron upon oath, that our own Mr Scott is a priest in a most extensive ministry; that there is none like it within the jurisdiction of the diocesan of the lowlands of Scotland: and I hereby challenge him to adduce a single instance of a real Protestant calling or sending for this priest, at the hour of death, in order to be reconciled to the Church of Rome, that he might have the benefit of dying in her communion. I am persuaded that nothing of the kind has occurred during the incumbency of this gentleman; but if he has indeed been called upon for the above purpose, in one single instance, I call upon him for the name and designation of the party; and if he shall furnish me with but one, the world shall hear of it, and all about it.

Dr Milner is speaking of persons, who, during their lives, entertain doubts of the truth of their religion. These are not truly Protestants; and, what is a more serious consideration, such persons are not truly Christians; for nothing can be more unchristian like than to entertain doubts of the truth of the Christian religion. Dr Milner will evade this by saying, he does not mean persons who entertain doubts of the Christian religion; "but those who entertain doubts concerning the truth of their religion." But this is admitting, and even pleading, that their religion is something different from the Christian religion; and, therefore, the boasted achievement of converting such persons to Popery, is merely turning them from one system of error to another.

Such persons are represented as experiencing "redoubled anxiety at the approach of death." And no wonder. They do not believe the divine testimony concerning Jesus Christ. They have doubts about the truth of their religion; which is quite inconsistent with a belief of the gospel; and in such a state of mind they must be horribly anxious in the prospect of death; unless, as is often the case, they be quite insensible of their sin and danger. These are the sort of persons, of whom Dr Milner boasts, as seeking, at the point of death, to be reconciled to the Church of Rome, that they may die in her communion.

This furnishes a strong argument against that church. It presents her in the light of a mere empiric; who, by certain incantations, can perform cures better than any regular practitioner. The regular prescription of the word of God to sinners in the prospect of death, as well as to those just entering upon active life, is, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ;"—"Repent and be converted, and ye shall receive the remission of sins." This is what we are authorized to say to the greatest sinners, even at the point of death; and the Lord may bless his own word for the salvation of the vilest, at the last hour, as no doubt he has done to many. But in general those who live in sin, are left to die as they have lived. They have, perhaps, no person about them who can tell them of the mercy of God in Jesus Christ, for the salvation of the ungodly; or, if they should be favoured by the presence of such: and if they should have the gospel of the grace of God stated to them ever so plainly and affectionately, their carnal mind, instead of being subdued, may revolt, and rebel against it, as insulting to them, who, notwithstanding innumerable transgressions, are still so far righteous in their own eyes, that they cannot submit to the gospel plan, or accept of salvation as the free gift of divine mercy.

Now Popery is just the thing that suits such persons. It flatters them with a hope of salvation without the hard necessity of denying themselves, of forsaking their sins, and submitting to the righteousness of God. It is not wonderful that persons who do not understand the gospel method of salvation, should submit to Popish teaching, which is so agreeable to the principles of our fallen nature. The mystery is, that so few, among thousands of merely nominal Protestants, should fall into the snare that is laid for them by a host of cunning seducers, in the form of Popish priests, who prowl about the country seeking whom they may deceive. They tell the simple and the serious—those who seem to be concerned for the salvation of their souls, but who have not found peace of mind, and hope towards God by the belief of his word, which is perhaps the melancholy condition of not a few,—that if they will become reconciled to the church, they will ensure their eternal salvation; and as drowning persons will catch at a straw in hope of being saved by means of it, so such persons as are here described will put implicit confidence in their ghostly advisers, and submit to their teaching and discipline, in the hope of finding that peace which the word of God does not profess to give to any man, but in connection with his being renewed from sin to holiness. The priest, as I have often said, promises peace of mind without this condition; and, considering how ignorant of Christianity many who are called Protestants are, it is not surprising that now and then, an individual, alarmed by the prospect of death, should grasp at the peace and security which a priest promises with so much confidence, and seek admission to the church that professes to save him by certain operations, such as the sacraments, without his being obliged to renounce either his sins or his righteousness. The wonder is, that Popery has not more of such converts to boast of; and it is indeed a wonder that our Glasgow Papists cannot boast of a single instance. There are, no doubt, many among us who would like to go to heaven, who do not like the gospel way; but to whom the Popish way would be perfectly agreeable, were it not for the expense; * yet we might expect

* Two Papists lately ventured into a Protestant place of worship, in the neighbourhood of this city, where they heard the gospel of salvation by free grace. This was so different from what they had been accustomed to hear, that it excited their serious attention; and one was heard to say to the other, on retiring;—"Well, if what this that persons would get over this difficulty when about to die, though it seems they cannot; for I assert again, that of that which Dr Milner declares to be so common, I never heard of a single instance having happened in Glasgow; and I do not believe such a thing can be proved.

I shall here give an illustrious example of the sort of conversion of which Dr Milner boasts, and of the means by which it was effected. It is that of Anthony Ulric, Duke of Brunswick, whose case is cited by Dr Milner himself, as an evidence of the truth of his statements. The duke took it into his head, in his old age, to be reconciled to the Church of Rome, from which his fathers had separated. He had been brought up a Protestant; but never having known what true Christianity was, he fell into doubts, and began a search after the true religion, which, according to his own account, he pursued most systematically, until he thought he found it in the Church of Rome. He wrote a book, or some one for him, entitled, "The Duke of Brunswick's Fifty Reasons for Preferring the Roman Catholic Religion to all other Sects." The following is his concluding and crowning reason, which may be considered as comprising the substance of his whole Fifty:—"I observed that many sectaries, who had seemed for many years to be fixed in their persuasion, were converted towards the end of their days, and desired to die in the Roman Catholic faith. But never did I meet with any Catholic that wished to die in another religion. Now it is chiefly at the hour of death that the soul opens its eyes into a clearer prospect of things eternal. For my own part, I resolved to live as I should wish to die; and for that reason I came to a resolution to embrace immediately the Catholic faith; because death is as certain as its hour is uncertain. Besides that, the Catholics, to whom I spoke concerning my conversion, assured me, that if I were to be damned for embracing the Catholic faith, they were ready to answer for me at the day of judgment, and to take my damnation upon themselves: an assurance I could never extort from the ministers of any sect, in case I should live and die in their religion. Whence I inferred that the Roman Catholic faith was built upon a better foundation than any of those sects that have divided from it."

Such was one of the most noble converts to Popery since the Reformation, and such was his crowning reason for being converted to what is falsely called the Catholic faith. It is not surprising that an old dotard, whose conscience was troublesome, should desire such peace as the Church of Rome promises to give; and seeing he had adopted the notion that the Church and her priests were infallible, and could not tell a lie, it is not wonderful that he should have believed that they were able and willing to take his damnation upon themselves, if necessary to allow him to escape, seeing, no doubt, he would pay them well for it; but, I suppose, it will appear to some of my readers very surprising, that English Papists, in the nineteenth century, with the vicar apostolic at their head, should boast of such a convert, and hold forth to the world such an argument, or reason for his conversion;—"that if he should be damned for becoming Papist, they would answer for him at the day of judgment, and take his damnation upon themselves!" The impiety and the impudence of the thing are beyond all expression; yet it must be the sentiment of English Papists at this day, and probably one of the means by which they make converts, seeing the book is strongly recommended by Dr Milner, and the edition before me was printed in Manchester, as lately as 1802. This alone is enough to show that Popery has received no amelioration; and that even the intellectual condition of Papists is deplorably low, notwithstanding the advancement of science, and the general diffusion of knowledge all around them. Not a particle of light seems to have entered their minds. To things spiritual and moral they are as much in the dark as their fathers were in the age of lead; and they exhibit at this moment such a prostration of intellect as we would scarcely expect to find among the most ignorant Hottentots.

Here I expect to be condemned by my polite and ultra liberal readers, for using language too strong; but let them look at the passage again, and let them try if they can to find words sufficiently strong to condemn such diabolical villany. I should rather say Popish villany; for I believe there is nothing recorded of the devil in sacred or profane history that can match this. I never heard of him promising those whom he wished to deceive, that if they should be damned, he would take their damnation on himself. This consummate species of imposition was reserved to be practised by modern Papists, for the purpose of gaining converts to the Church of Rome.

What is thus urged to prove the certainty of His Highness' faith, shows, in a very strong light, that he had no certainty at all, but was agitated by doubts and fears. He was not satisfied by his previous forty-nine reasons. He catches hold of this last one; and upon it he is willing to venture his eternity. He is priest says be true, I shall never go to chapel again; for here we are told that God will pardon our sins without any money at all." I do not boast of this as a conversion from Popery, for the man's mind does not appear to have risen any higher than the idea of escaping punishment without expense. Had he thought of the necessity of his forsaking sin, which, according to the gospel plan, is as necessary as having it pardoned, he would probably have preferred paying money to the priest as before. I mention this as probable; but, perhaps, I ought to hope for better things.

conscious that he has nothing but the word of fellow-creatures to rely upon; but this satisfies him, seeing he believes that if he is deceived by them they must be damned for him. Yet, after all, he is not clear about this, for his words bear, that he might be damned first; and he trusts to their being able and willing to take the sentence upon themselves. A generous mind could feel no satisfaction in the reflection that others were damned in his stead. Had His Highness condescended to take the bible for his guide, he would have found, that the principle which he avows was enough to condemn the whole system. Upon the gospel plan, there is no such thing as one man's escaping damnation at the expense of his neighbour's falling into it. Christianity knows of no substitution but that of Jesus Christ, who voluntarily put himself in the place of fallen man, that he might put away sin by the sacrifice of himself; and, having made atonement and reconciliation by his sufferings to the death, he rose from the dead to bestow the benefits resulting from his death upon all, of every nation, who should believe in him. One of these blessings is reconciliation and love to our fellow-men, especially our fellow-christians. It is one blessed fruit of the reconciliation effected by Christ's death, that every one who believes, and becomes interested in it, is taught to love his neighbour as himself. It is absolutely impossible that such a one should enjoy peace of mind from the reflection, that if he were damned, his neighbour would take the sentence upon him, and suffer in his stead. This, however, is the grand consideration that gave peace to the mind of the Duke of Brunswick, whose example is in the strongest manner recommended by Dr Milner, for the imitation of his Protestant friends in England. Upon this ground alone, though there were nothing else, every intelligent reader will perceive that Popery is the very opposite of genuine Christianity.

His Highness complains, that he could never get the ministers of any sect to promise that they would take his damnation upon them, if he should die in their communion; from which he infers that the Roman faith was built upon a better foundation than theirs. Now had he possessed a particle of common sense, he would have come to the very opposite conclusion. He would have said, "these are honest men; they know what they are about; and they are careful not to promise what they may not be able to perform." Had they been deceivers and Jesuits, who had no higher end in view, than to make merchandise of his soul, they would have promised any thing he pleased: but they knew that no man could stand in the place of another at the day of judgment: they knew that no man could escape damnation but in the way of being personally united to Christ by faith, and personally renewed from sin to holiness, of which, I suppose, they saw no evidence in His Highness; and, therefore, they would not flatter him with the false hope of his being saved, by his merely remaining in their communion. The statement of the fact, under His Highness' own hand, does great honour to the Protestants with whom he had conferred. It proves that they were not time-servers; but faithful ministers of Jesus Christ, who invites the high as well as the low to partake of the blessings which the gospel brings to their view,—not in this communion, or that communion exclusively, but by coming to the knowledge of the truth, and submitting to the righteousness of God.

One main pillar in the Romish idol temple is, that the salvation of men is secured by their being in her communion. Let poor simpletons submit to this, and the priests take all the rest upon themselves. If they can prevail upon poor, ignorant, wicked persons, at the point of death, to believe in their miraculous powers, which may happen in some instances, for the sake of the false peace in which they would rather die than without any peace at all, they submit to be baptized and anointed by priestly hands, and absolved by certain Latin words from a priestly tongue; and then the poor sinner says, Peace, peace to himself, when there is really no peace; and he goes down to the grave with a lie put into his mouth by his ghostly deceiver. Such are the conversions of Protestants at the hour of death, which Dr Milner boasts of as so frequent; but I again challenge Mr Scott to produce a single instance of the kind under his ministry

My mercantile readers understand what is meant by a guarantee commission; and they are aware that this is, or ought to be, in proportion to the degree of risk. No doubt, therefore, the Duke of Brunswick paid largely for the risk which the priests took upon themselves; and if this Number of mine should ever reach a descendant of that illustrious house, from which our own royal family is sprung, I request that strict search may be made in the archives of the family, in order to ascertain what His Highness really paid for the accommodation which the priests granted to him. It must have been something very considerable; and yet, if we can suppose that these priests received a pecuniary consideration, for taking the duke's damnation upon themselves, we must suppose them to have been infidels of the most abandoned description. In this, however, there is nothing worse than what happens every day, in their trafficking for the release of souls from purgatory.

No. CLXXXIX.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 23D, 1822.

IN taking leave of what Dr Milner calls the second false Rule of faith, I remark, that I have not attempted to reply to all the nonsense which he has introduced; but have endeavoured rather to maintain the general principle, that the bible alone is sufficient for the instruction of men in matters of religion; and that those who believe the heavenly doctrines which it contains, are certain of what they believe, and substantially agreed about it; while those who rely on the traditions of men possess no more than a dead image of certainty and unity; while in reality they have neither faith, nor unity, nor certainty about any thing, seeing they have no higher authority for what they believe than the bare word of creatures like themselves.

I come now to what Dr Milner calls "The True Rule," which he lays down in the following terms:—"The Catholic Rule of faith, as I stated before, is not merely the written word of God, but the whole word of God, both written and unwritten; in other words, Scripture and Tradition, and these propounded and explained by the Catholic Church. This implies that we have a twofold Rule, or Law, and that we have an Interpreter or Judge, to explain it, and to decide upon it in all doubtful points." Letter X.

There is here, as usual, a little trick by which the unwary may be deceived. Dr Milner professes to take as his Rule the "whole word of God," by which he insinuates that Protestants do not so: and he introduces tradition as forming part of that word, as if this were admitted by Protestants, while yet they refuse to submit to it. Now I say, that Protestants receive the whole word of God, without the exception of a syllable or letter of it; and that his foisting in "tradition" as forming part of that word is begging the question in dispute, and which is denied by his opponent. To the whole word of God we implicitly submit; but this implies no submission to the immense heap of rubbish that lies under the name of tradition.

On entering upon the proof of his proposition, Dr Milner lays down the following as an indisputable axiom:—"I enter upon this subject with observing, that all written laws necessarily suppose the existence of unwritten laws, and indeed depend upon them for their force and authority. Not to run into the depths of ethics and metaphysics on this subject; you know, dear Sir, that in this kingdom we have common or unwritten law, and statute or written law, both of them binding; but that the former necessarily precedes the latter." Letter X. We are then favoured with a view of the law of England, which, according to Judge Blackstone, may be divided into lex non scripta and lex scripta, as Dr Milner gravely tells us: but the Christian reader will naturally inquire, what has this to do with the "true religion," which is not founded upon the laws of England, however good these are in their own place, and for their own purposes? For the "true religion" we must have recourse to the law and to the testimony that existed many ages before England made any figure among the nations of the world. We are sure therefore that the laws of England can afford us no light while pursuing an inquiry of this kind.

Dr Milner says that all written laws necessarily suppose the existence of unwritten laws, and depend upon them for their force and authority. For this he gives us no higher authority than his own word. To put him to the proof of his proposition, I ask him, whether the law of the Ten Commandments, which was written by the finger of God, upon tables of stone, on mount Sinai, necessarily supposed the existence of another law that was prior to it, but not written, and upon which this written law of the Ten Commandments depended for its force and authority? To be consistent, Dr Milner must answer in the affirmative. He must maintain that there is another law antecedent and superior to that of the Ten Commandments. I shall feel extremely obliged to him if he will tell me what that law is.

I suppose he will refer me to the patriarchs who lived before, and after the flood, down to the time of Moses, when the law was first written; and he will tell me that these patriarchs lived under the authority of lex non scripta: that is, the unwritten or common law; but this will not serve his purpose, unless he can show that this was something different from the written law of Moses,—something superior to it, and from which the law of Moses derived its authority. I know he can show no such thing; and that what he asserts with so much confidence is a mere imagination of the carnal mind.

On this subject, however, I must dwell for a little, because one great argument which Papists advance for the authority of their tradition is connected with the history of the patriarchs. They tell us that the faithful had nothing but tradition to guide them for above two thousand years;* that is, from Adam to

* Dr Milner's words are:—"It is, then, certain, that the whole doctrine and practice of religion, including the rites of sacrifice, and, indeed, the whole sacred history, was preserved by the patriarchs, in succession from Adam down to Moses, during the space of 2400 years, by means of tradition: and when the law was written, many most important truths, regarding a future life, the emblems and prophecies regarding the Messiah, and the inspiration and authenticity of the sacred books themselves, were preserved in the same way." Letter XI. p. 107.

Moses;—and why should not we take the benefit of tradition from the birth of Christ to our own time, which is a shorter period? I reply, that the argument is founded on a falsehood; for it is not true that all, or that any of the patriarchs had to depend upon mere tradition, in the sense in which Papists use the word. The patriarchs were honoured by direct communications from God; and what he revealed to them, and they communicated to their families, was not human tradition but divine revelation, as much as the written word is, and it served all the purposes of divine revelation until the law and the testimony were written. Supposing the moral law, and the promise of a Saviour to come of the seed of the woman, had been matters of mere tradition, they passed through so few hands that they might have been preserved till the time of Moses without any great mixture of error; for Methusaleh was cotemporary with both Adam and Shem, and the latter was cotemporary with Isaac, so that the whole narrative of the creation, the fall, and the promise of redemption, came down to the family of Jacob through only four hands, whereas no apostolic tradition can have come down to us without having passed through ten times as many generations. But I do not admit that the family of Jacob received the knowledge of the will of God by such tradition, even through hands so few and so clean. God revealed his gospel to Enoch, to Noah, to Abraham, and to Jacob himself, who were all, therefore, inspired men as much as any of the prophets or apostles were; indeed in Psalm cv. 15. they are called prophets; and their living voice supplied the place of a written word until Israel went down to Egypt; and even after this for nearly a century they enjoyed the ministry of Joseph, who was endowed with the prophetic spirit. If the children of Israel had at any time nothing but tradition to depend upon, it must have been during the short period that elapsed between the death of Joseph and the calling of Moses; when, no doubt, they were reduced to great ignorance as well as great misery; yet we do not know that they had no prophet among them even then. There is reason to think that Moses' own parents had a divine intimation, when he was born, that led them to the means by which his life was preserved. Be this as it may, I hope it will appear from the above, that there is nothing in the history of the patriarchs who lived before the word of God was committed to writing, that can give countenance to the doctrine, that the word which has been written by inspired men must depend, for its meaning and authority, upon the unwritten traditions which have come to us through many ages of gross darkness, and through hands polluted by every crime.

If I have made this intelligible, I hope the reader will be convinced that there is nothing in the history of the patriarchs, or in the state of religion in their time, that gives the least countenance to that sort of tradition on which the faith of the Church of Rome is chiefly founded.

Now, with regard to the apostles, great stress is laid by Dr Milner, and all Popish writers, on the command of Christ to go into all the world and preach the gospel—"by word of mouth," is added by Dr Milner, though that is not in the commission as Christ gave it, and is not necessarily implied in the words, which are a command to publish, and make known, by whatever means. The additional words, however, are of great use to Popish writers, and they could not get on without them; for as they take for granted that all their bishops and priests are successors of the apostles, and endowed with the same authority and power, they could not prove the authority of their oral teaching, without referring to that of the apostles. Now, there is no dispute about the authority of what the apostles taught by word of mouth. The question is, what is it that they so taught? and where is it to be found? Protestants maintain that it is all summarily contained in the New Testament: Papists maintain that a great mass of it was never written at all, but handed down from age to age, by word of mouth; and what has thus come down to the present age, is as much the word of God as that which apostles wrote; and it is expressly called by Dr Milner "The unwritten word" of God. He represents this as analagous to the lex non scripta, the unwritten and common law of England; and as this gives force and authority to the written or statute law, so tradition gives authority and force to the written word of God.

This is the substance of some long and laboured paragraphs in Dr Milner's work, which I would have given in his own words, had not his style been so extremely diffuse, that I cannot afford space for one tenth of his verbiage. I am not, however, conscious of misrepresenting a single iota of his doctrine. Indeed his own words quoted in this Number will be found to imply all that I have said. And thus the foundation of his faith and his certainty is that which no man would depend upon, if he had an acre of land, or the value of it, to be secured to himself and his heirs. Undisputed possession for a certain period will indeed allow a man to claim a piece of land as his own; but he will take care to put the fact upon record, if he desires to preserve his right. But here the Church of Rome teaches her children to rest their eternal interests upon tradition; that is, a report of what was spoken eighteen hundred years ago, and has been transmitted by word of mouth through all the dark ages! I am verily persuaded Dr Milner himself would not venture a shilling of his worldly property upon any thing that depended upon such evidence.

But does not the apostle Paul command Christians to obey tradition as well as the written word of God? Does he not say to the Thessalonian converts, "Stand fast, and hold the traditions which ye have been taught, whether by word or our epistle," 2 Thes. ii. 15? And again, in the third chapter of the same epistle, verse 6, does he not command them to "withdraw from every brother who walketh disorderly, and not after the tradition which he hath received of us?" This is all very true, and readily admitted; and if Dr Milner could tell us with certainty what these traditions were, and what it was that the apostle told the people by word of mouth, I would without hesitation receive it as the word of God: and if it did not evidently appear to be a thing of a temporary and local nature, I would say that it commanded the faith and obedience of Christians.

It cannot be doubted that a great part of the oral teaching of the apostles related to things of a local and temporary nature; such as the condition of the Jewish converts, and the conduct that became them in their peculiar circumstances, in the prospect of the destruction of Jerusalem, and after that event had taken place. Having a living and divine oracle in the persons of the apostles, who spoke by inspiration of the Holy Ghost, the Christians would have recourse to them for instruction and advice in every emergency. When personally present, advice and instruction would be communicated by word of mouth, and when absent by writing. Either way, the communication was of divine authority, and as such it would be received by the individuals and churches to whom it was addressed.

It was not necessary that instruction with regard to every thing of a temporary nature should be committed to writing, seeing inspired teachers were continued to the churches as long as the occasion required; but that things of universal and permanent obligation were committed to writing we know by the fact, that such writings exist, with abundant evidence that they are the word of God. But whether that which apostles enjoined regarded things temporary or permanent, local or universal, it was imperative on Christians to obey, for the apostles spoke by the Spirit of God, whether it was by word or by epistle. That some apostolical instructions did relate to temporary things, is evident from the introduction of at least one of those things into one of Paul's epistles; and the reason seems to be, that application was made to him in writing, while he was absent, for advice relating to a matter of great importance at the time; and he gave his answer and his advice in writing, as we have it in the seventh chapter of 1st Corinthians.

Mistaking the design, and overlooking the occasion of this advice, many have understood the apostle as laying down the general proposition, that it is better for both men and women to remain single than to marry, which is directly contrary to his own words;—"I will that the younger women marry;" and, "marriage is honourable in all," 1 Tim. v. 14. Heb. xiii. 4. It was, however, to be regulated by prudential considerations; and it was solely because of "the present distress," that he advised the Corinthian converts to abstain from marriage; though even this he does not lay upon any one as a command, but merely suggests it as an advice. I have made this digression in order to show that the churches were in the practice of consulting the apostles in cases of difficulty, with regard to matters of a temporary and comparatively private nature; and that it does not thence follow that the responses which they received, were of permanent and universal obligation, unless they have been recorded and delivered as such, in the apostolic writings.

But we will come to a better understanding of the subject by attending to the meaning of the word. Tradition is not a word of native English growth, but like many others has been transplanted from the Latin; and its meaning in English, according to Dr Johnson, is, something delivered by word of mouth without written memorials;—or any thing delivered orally from age to age. But this is not the meaning, at least, not the whole meaning of the Greek word of which tradition is meant for a translation. Παράδοσις is the word which the apostle wrote, and it signifies, precept, instruction, ordinance, delivered either orally or in writing. See the Lexicons. But I have higher authority than that of any lexicographer; namely, that of the apostle Paul himself, who says, "stand fast and hold the traditions (παράδοσις) which ye have been taught, whether by word or our epistle." The precept or instructions, therefore, to which he referred, had been communicated both orally and in writing; or might have been communicated either way.

Now this brings us to this point, that when the apostle Paul exhorted the believers in Thessalonica, to hold fast the traditions (παράδοσις) he meant the things which he had preached to them, and the things which he had written to them, in his former epistle. He refers in the first place to what he had taught them by word. What this was we may learn from what is recorded of the ordinary topics on which the apostles preached; and we know that their preaching related chiefly, if not solely, to Christ's life, death, and resurrection; in other words, they preached the gospel of the grace of God,—"how that Christ died for our sins according to the scriptures." This is called, "the word,"—"the things reported unto you,"—and "a faithful saying;"—expressions of nearly the same import with what is meant by tradition, when stripped of the dress in which Papists have disguised it. We know that this "word," or "saying," is from a sermon which the apostle Peter delivered in the house of Cornelius, Acts x. 36—48. It is a narrative of Christ's life, death, and resurrection; and this he expressly called the word; that is, saying, report, tradition, if you will; for it is said, verse 44, "while Peter yet spake these words,"—that is, while he was giving this narrative of facts, of which he had been a witness, "the Holy Ghost fell on all them that heard the word," which word was just this testimony concerning Christ. That Paul's preaching was in the same strain, we learn from the report of a sermon of his in Antioch, Acts xiii. 23—43. in which, along with a narrative of facts about Christ's death and resurrection, he tells the persons who listened to his preaching, that "through this Man was preached to them the remission of sins; and that through him all who believe are justified from all things from which they could not be justified by the law of Moses."* From these two eminent examples, and there are more in the same book, we may conclude that this was the substance of the preaching of all the apostles. It was by the power of this word or report, when accompanied by the blessing of the Holy Ghost, that sinners, whether Jews or Gentiles, were converted;—and "turned from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God." Companies of men and women so converted, were instructed to meet together, for the purpose of prayer, and for the observance of the other ordinances which God had commanded. These were the primitive churches; many of which were organized by apostles in person, others by evangelists acting under their direction. Among some of them Paul continued to preach for a considerable period; and to many of them he wrote letters in his absence,—most of them, I believe, when he was a prisoner in Rome. In these letters he does not go over in detail the narrative of facts which he made the first subject of his preaching. He takes them for granted. He often alludes to them in a summary way; and again and again, he exhorts his correspondents to keep them in memory; —to hold them fast, and on no account to let them slip out of their minds. In these was the "faithful saying," "the word," "the report," the traditions, which he had delivered to them by word of mouth, and of which he reminded them in every epistle. I say he reminded them of them, for it was not necessary that he should repeat them all in his letters, seeing they were detailed in the narratives called the gospels, either published by this time, or about to be published. Before the publication of the gospels, these things were all communicated by word of mouth, but it was by the mouth of inspired men. They ceased to speak, one by one, as their Master called them to rest from their labours; but they were not all removed till they had committed to writing the things which they had so long declared by their living voice. These are what we have in the New Testament,—having which, we have their word, as really as those who heard them speak, and all the traditions which are of permanent use, and universal obligation among Christians. And I defy the Church of Rome to adduce a single article of doctrine, or ordinance of worship, which she has derived from oral tradition, that is not contrary to, or inconsistent with some part of the written word; and therefore it cannot be of God; for it is the height of impiety and blasphemy to say, that He commanded his servants to teach one thing with their pens, and a contrary thing with their mouths.

"All scripture is given by inspiration of God; —and is able to make the man of God perfect, thoroughly furnished unto every good work." Christians can desire no more than the word which is able to make them perfect, which must itself be a perfect word. But Papists dissatisfied with this, and seeking for something else, have landed themselves in ignorance, superstition, idolatry, and every evil work.

* The reader is requested to turn to the passages and peruse them attentively. It is of more importance to be acquainted with the tenor of the apostles' preaching than to study the style of any modern pulpit orator. It was the plain unencumbered doctrine of Christ crucified, that produced such wonderful effects by the preaching of the apostles; and it is the same doctrine, and nothing else, even now, that can be of any use in the way of converting sinners. The Moravians who went to Greenland, began to teach systematically. They descanted on the being and perfections of God;—very proper subjects, most certainly, for an enlightened Christian assembly; but they made no impression on the poor Greenlanders, whose minds were not prepared to take in such things. Almost in despair of doing any good, the Missionaries began at last to speak about Jesus Christ, and his wonderful kindness and mercy to poor sinners; and this was found to melt the hearts even of the men of Greenland. See Crantz's History. I have not the work at hand, and cannot refer to the page; but the above anecdote is well known.

No. CXC.

SATURDAY, MARCH 2D, 1822.

THE True Rule of faith, according to Dr Milner, "is not merely the written word of God, but the whole word of God, both written and unwritten; in other words, scripture and tradition, and these propounded and explained by the Catholic Church." In my last Number I did little more than clear the way for the consideration of this proposition. Seeing, in two passages of one of his epistles, the apostle Paul makes use of a word which is rendered tradition in English, Popish writers are in the habit of citing his authority in favour of their traditions; but I showed that what he referred to were communications made by himself under divine inspiration, including the apostolic testimony and report concerning Christ, as recorded in the gospel history: and, seeing Dr Milner alleges that the ancient patriarchs received all that they knew of religion for 2400 years from tradition, I showed that the patriarchs were themselves prophets, and received from God himself that religion which they communicated to their families; and thus it is evident that the Popish doctrine of tradition derives no countenance from apostles or patriarchs: and I might have added, that such traditions as the Papists plead for, were strongly condemned by Christ, in his discourses to the Pharisees, who made void the law by their traditions, just as the Papists make void the gospel by theirs.

The simple statement of what Papists mean by tradition might be enough to convince persons of common sense of the folly of depending upon it. It consists of certain doctrines and precepts, which Christ and the apostles are said to have spoken, but which were not committed to writing. These doctrines and precepts are said to have been delivered by word of mouth from one age to another, and to have come down to us as pure and uncorrupted as the written word contained in the gospels and epistles. Those who can believe this, must believe in the existence of a perpetual miracle, without any conceivable reason for miraculous interposition, seeing the object could have been accomplished by the ordinary means of writing. Dr Milner, however, not only believes this certainty of traditional communication, but he believes further, and stoutly maintains, that by this means, the knowledge of Christianity might have been preserved and propagated in the world, though there had not been a word of divine revelation committed to writing. No doubt God could have done this, had he thought fit to preserve a succession of inspired men in all ages, as he did in the ages before his word was written; but what He could have done is no rule to us;—our business is with what he has done; and we know that he has given us his word in the scriptures, with a command to receive and apply our minds to the understanding of it; that he has not commanded us to receive the traditions of men, but to beware of them; and therefore we feel upon sure ground when we rely on the written word alone.

The other arguments from scripture in favour of tradition, are Christ's command to all men to hear the apostles;—"He that heareth you, heareth me;" and, "if he refuse to hear the church let him be unto thee as a heathen and a publican." Now, I have admitted that it was the duty of all men to hear what the apostles said to them; but this has nothing to do with what other men have said, or may yet say;—and Popish tradition consists entirely of what other men said. I deny that the apostles spoke a word of that which the Church of Rome propounds as apostolical tradition. This is not asserting a negative; for the church has condescended to mention what some of her traditions are,—such as the mass sacrifice, purgatory, and prayers for the dead; and as these are directly opposed to what the apostles wrote, I am sure they formed no part of their oral teachings, for they both wrote and spoke under the influence of the divine Spirit, who cannot teach contradictions. But suppose I had no such positive evidence on the subject; suppose it were all negative on that side; I am entitled to deny that of which there is no evidence. At any rate, the burden of proof rests with those who maintain the truth of tradition; and I challenge them to prove the genuineness of a single sentence ascribed to Christ and his apostles beyond what we have in the New Testament.

Aye, but, says Dr Milner, the apostles had their successors, and Christ included them when he said, "He that heareth you, heareth me;" and these words cannot be restricted to the apostles, for as they continued only for the ordinary period of human life, it was impossible that all nations, and all ages, could receive the gospel from them personally; therefore Christ must have included their successors, who are the priests of the Catholic Church, the depositaries of the faith, by whom the unwritten word of God, that is, apostolical tradition, has come down to us with infallible certainty.

These are not precisely Dr Milner's words, but they are the substance of his argument. And I reply, first, that the apostles as such had no successors; which I showed at length in my reply to the Catholic Vindicator: and now, secondly, I maintain, that there was no need of any successors to the apostles, or any to fill their place, after they had committed their words to writing, and gone to receive their reward. Hearing the apostles is not a mere acoustic operation;—it is not the mere reception of sounds into the ear. Papists indeed argue as if it were nothing else; and thus it is that they degrade and carnalize every thing that they touch. They think it impossible to hear the apostles, unless the sound of their voice shall literally be received into our ears, or the sound of the voice of some person who pretends to be one of their successors. But in the scripture sense of the expression, to hear the apostles, signifies the belief of their testimony, and submission to the ordinances which they appointed in their Master's name. Thus they are as effectually heard in their writings as they were by their living voice; and the submission of the heart and life to what they wrote, is obedience to the divine command to hear them. When the voice from the excellent glory said, concerning Jesus himself, "This is my beloved Son, hear ye him," the divine command was,—believe what he teaches, and obey what he commands; and not merely listen to the sound of his voice, which many did, who derived no benefit from it, because they would not obey his voice; and their not obeying it was the same as not hearing it. But he who really receives the truth which the apostles wrote, obeys the command to hear them; and therefore there was no need of successors, to tell us of something which they said but did not write.

With regard to the priests, who call themselves successors of the apostles, and depositaries of the faith, the world is able to judge what credit is due to their testimony in relation to what the apostles are said to have communicated by word of mouth. None of them profess to have lived so long as to have been ear-witnesses of what any of the apostles personally taught; and therefore, supposing the present race to be as honest as it is possible for men to be, there can be no certainty with regard to any thing that they say has been handed down to them from the apostolic age. This objection gathers strength from the well-known character of the great body of the priests for more than a thousand years. There is a universal tradition on this subject, both oral and written, the truth of which no man can doubt; namely, that the state of morals among the priesthood was profligate in the extreme. This was so universal, and exceptions were so rare, that it was almost a miracle to find a godly man among them. Now, suppose it were admitted that tradition contained nothing but sound doctrine for an age or two after the apostles, it must necessarily have become corrupted when taken up and transmitted by such corrupt men. They could not be the means of preserving, and the medium of communicating, holy doctrines and pure precepts, which condemned them, and must have been abhorred by them. Whatever came into contact with them must have been defiled. Water from the purest fountain will be found unsavory after passing through a dunghill.

It may be admitted that, by the increase and general diffusion of knowledge, the character of the priests of the present day is not so bad, at least in Protestant countries; yet I would not trust much to their traditions. I shall suppose Dr Milner to be one of the best of his order; yet, when I see that he asserts in his introduction, that the Bishop of St David's wrote a Catechism which taught men to "hate and persecute their elder brethren," and when I find that the said Catechism contains no such thing, I am compelled to conclude, that tradition passing through such a mind may have received a bias that makes it of no value. If a man shall mistake, and grossly misrepresent what he reads with his own eyes, I can have no confidence in the accuracy of what he professes to have received by his ears, though given only at second hand, much less when it has come through a hundred such hands; and this is the case with all that the Romish Church propounds to her children under the name of the "unwritten word of God."

The next branch of the argument is that which requires men to hear the church. Papists with one voice maintain that this means the Church of Rome; and that all men who will not hear and submit to her must be accursed. But she has not yet made it appear, and she never can make it appear, that she is here specially intended, any more than the Church of England or that of Scotland; for she had no existence, any more than these, when our Saviour gave that commandment. And the truth is, this command, Matt. xviii. 16. does not relate to any one church more than another, but to every particular church or congregation that may unhappily have an offending or immoral person among them. They are commanded to take certain steps to recover him from his error, and if they cannot prevail upon him, that is, if he will not hear them; they are commanded to consider him as a heathen and a publican; which implies no more than being excluded from the fellowship of Christians, of which he showed himself unworthy. Any person who will read the passage carefully will find that it contains no more than I have here stated; and yet these words are repeated by every Popish writer to prove the supreme authority of the Church of Rome;—"Let him hear the church;"—"If he refuse to hear the church," &c. Under these words she claims a right to propound for belief, and to enjoin for practice, whatever she pleases; and all who will not obey come under the anathema of those who refuse to hear the church!

The church of Rome has been very sparing in her information with regard to the particular doctrines and ordinances which she has received from tradition. I have mentioned one or two things which have been divulged as derived from that source, though most Popish writers endeavour to find scripture for these too, which seems to intimate that mere tradition does not satisfy them. But, so far as I know, there is no publication, printed or manuscript, that contains a summary or detailed account of what the church believes under the head of tradition. It may be any thing, or it may be nothing, for what any man out of the church can tell; for the very writing of it would destroy it as a matter of oral tradition; and therefore Protestants can never know what it is. As for lay persons in the Church of Rome, every one must receive it from the lips of his priest. It is that which the "Catholic Church propounds;" and as this is too large a body to propound any thing, otherwise than by the mouth of its official organs, every priest is the propounder of what he considers a Catholic tradition; which may be a mere whimsy of his own, and yet his people must receive it as infallibly true. Thus there may be as many whimsies as priests, all contradicting one another; for there is no authentic standard to which an appeal can be made, and by which an inquirer can satisfy himself who reports the tradition correctly.

But the "Catholic Church;" that is, the Popish priests; are not only propounders, they are also the explainers of both the written and unwritten word; and neither scripture nor tradition is to be considered the rule of faith otherwise than as propounded and explained by them. This power of explaining sets every thing to rights; for let the articles of tradition brought to view be ever so contradictory, the explanation of a priest can reconcile them to one another so completely, that he will, if necessary, swear that they are the very same; just as a ghostly juggler can convert the December of one year to the June of another, when such conversion is necessary to serve a purpose.

I am aware that to these common sense arguments against Popish traditions, writers of that communion adduce the promise of Christ to be with his church to the end of the world, and the promise of his Spirit to lead them into all truth. These promises they consider as belonging exclusively to the Church of Rome, and as infallibly securing the priests, "the successors of the apostles," from ever falling into error. But this is again begging the question; it is an impudent assuming of the very thing that is denied, and which she is called upon to prove, but which it is certain she never can prove. Christ promised to be with his church to the end of the world; that is, with those who are separated from the world which lieth in wickedness, and who are devoted in heart and life to the service of God. Christ promised to be present with such to bless them; but it is as explicitly declared that the face of God is against them that do evil. It must therefore be against the Church of Rome, which, like Ahab, has sold itself to do wickedly above all that ever pretended to be Christian. This all the world knows; and of this Dr Milner cannot be ignorant. I beg leave, therefore, to remind him of the words of the Duke of Brunswick, which he quotes with approbation, and which are indeed words of wisdom, though partly quoted from an apocryphal book:—"Secondly, I made a strong resolution, by the grace of God, to avoid sin, well knowing that wisdom will not enter into a corrupt mind, nor dwell in a body subject to sin! Wisd. i. 4." I ask Dr Milner, then, how wisdom could dwell in a so body thoroughly corrupt as he knows the Church of Rome to have been for many centuries? and how he or any man can believe that this is the church in which Christ promised to dwell by his Spirit to the end of the world? There is blasphemy in the very imagination of the thing, as it tends to represent Christ as the minister of sin, and dwelling in the temple of wickedness, while he is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, and cannot look upon sin. Yet so certain is Dr Milner of the truth of those absurdities which I have been exposing, especially of the traditions propounded and explained by the church, that he tells us, at the conclusion of this branch of his argument, that if it were possible for him to be mistaken, he would lay the blame on his Maker! "Were it possible for me to err in following the Catholic method, with such a mass of evidence in its favour, methinks I would answer at the judgment-seat of Eternal Truth, with a pious writer of the middle ages: 'Lord, if I have been deceived thou art the author of my error.'" Hugh of St Victor, p. 116. There is no arguing with a man capable of such impieties. This reminds us of what Mr Burke said of the infidel Rousseau, that he wrote a book of Confessions, which he proposed to throw in the face of his Maker at the last day; but the infidel did not go so far as to say that he would lay the blame of his errors on his Maker; but merely to declare that he was as good a man as any who should be present at the judgment-seat.

Having noticed the principal arguments in favour of tradition, which are drawn from scripture, I shall now advert to one, which, I suppose, is founded on tradition itself:—"True it is," says Dr Milner, "that the apostles, before they separated to preach the gospel in different nations, agreed upon a short symbol or profession of faith, called the Apostles' Creed; but even this they did not commit to writing: and whereas they made this among other articles of it, 'I believe in the holy church,' * they made no mention at all of the holy scriptures. This circumstance confirms what their example proves, that the Christian doctrine and discipline might have been propagated and preserved by the unwritten word or tradition, joined with the authority of the church, though the scriptures had not been composed; however profitable these most certainly are for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, and instruction in righteousness." Letter X. p. 86.

What Dr Milner here propounds under the positive assurance, that "True it is," is not an oral tradition to him, seeing he gives it on the authority of Rufinus, who had it from an earlier author, who had committed it to writing; but this author lived so long after the apostles, that he could know no more of their acts, from an authentic source, than we do. It was probably an oral tradition to him; but though it were more credible than it is, we are entitled to hold it as an idle tale, which can prove nothing, seeing itself requires first to be proved.

* "The title Catholic was afterwards added, when heresies increased."

It was one of the evidences of the divine mission of the apostles, that, without concert or formal agreement on any articles of faith, they all spoke the same things, and bore testimony to the same facts of which they had been witnesses. That this was the case is evident from the narrative in the Acts of the Apostles. They were not qualified to propound articles of faith till they had received the gift of the Holy Ghost; and then instantly they began to preach, and continued to preach, not in the measured terms of a previous systematic arrangement, agreed upon among themselves, but as the Holy Ghost gave them utterance. Yes; but Dr Milner says, that before they separated to preach the gospel in different nations, they "agreed upon a short symbol or profession of faith, called the Apostles' Creed." Now what could be the use of this to them? The Holy Ghost continued with them, wherever they went, teaching them all to speak substantially the same things. To have made such an agreement would have indicated a jealousy of one another, or a doubt of the Spirit's remaining in them, which ought not to be supposed. It may be very well for uninspired men to arrange the truths of divine revelation in a systematic form, in order to their satisfying one another as to their understanding and agreement with regard to divine truth; but this was quite unnecessary for the apostles who knew that they all spoke by one unerring Spirit.

If it be alleged that they composed the Creed not for their own sakes, but for the use of the common people; I reply, that this work of all the twelve, if it were such, presents nothing half so useful as what may be found in the writings of any one of them who did write. I grant that this short symbol presents the leading truths of Christianity in very few words; but taken by itself, without a previous acquaintance with these truths, it must be quite unintelligible and useless. Every Papist, I suppose, can say it from memory; but he acquires no more knowledge of the true religion from it, than if he had learned to say it backwards. Its articles are stated so concisely, that it is little else than a general index of Christian doctrines; so that the profession of it cannot ascertain what a man's real sentiments are with regard to most of the things which it embraces. The truth with regard to the person of Christ is stated somewhat in detail; but of what follows no man could make any thing unless he had information from another source. "I believe in the Holy Ghost," is professing nothing, unless we know who the Holy Ghost is, and what is his part in the plan of our salvation. "I believe in the holy Church," are equally words without meaning, in the mouth of a person who does not know what is meant by the words church and holy, in the New Testament. Papists understand one thing and Protestants another, by the very same expression; but neither would understand any thing at all, if he had not previous information. And as for the "communion of saints," I suppose there are few Papists who can tell what it is. In short, it is confessed on all hands, that this Creed was inadequate as a standard of orthodoxy when disputes began to multiply. Hence it was found necessary to compose other and larger ones, such as the Nicene and Athanasian; but neither have they served the purpose of preserving unity among Christians, even in the same communion.

I conclude this Number with remarking, that if Dr Milner could prove the Creed to have been the work of the twelve apostles, I would turn it against himself, by showing that they knew nothing of a body called the Catholic Church, seeing that word was foisted into the composition ages after their time.

No. CXCI.

SATURDAY, March 9th, 1822.

One principal mode of defence adopted by Popish writers is, to make it appear that their opponents hold the same principles with themselves; and they think their church fully vindicated if they can show that what is charged against them is allowed by any class of Protestants. If it were so, the Protestants who agreed with them could not attack them with a good grace; but in most instances, where such agreement is alleged, there will be found a great difference of principles, with only a slight resemblance in words.

Thus on the subject of tradition, there is a sense in which Protestants use the word, and they admit the thing which it expresses, with certain modifications. What they understand by it, and the use they make of it, are very different from tradition in the Popish sense, which Dr Milner cannot but know; yet he argues as if he did not know it; and he writes as if we were as much the slaves of tradition as himself. Thus he writes:—"With all their repugnance to tradition and church authority, Protestants have found themselves absolutely obliged, in many instances, to admit of them both. It has been demonstrated above, that they are obliged to admit of tradition in order to admit of scripture itself. Without this, they can neither know that there are any writings at all dictated by God's inspiration, nor which, in particular, these writings are, nor what versions or publications of them are genuine." Letter XI. p. 96. He then proceeds to tell us of certain articles of faith and practice, which, he says, we have derived from tradition, to which I shall attend by and by. But I must first dispose of his assertion, that we are "obliged to admit of tradition in order to admit of scripture itself."

The reader is requested to remember, that by tradition, Dr Milner means something handed down, through eighteen centuries, by word of mouth, independent of written testimony. Now I deny that Protestants depend upon such tradition for any thing, or admit of it for any purpose whatever. But they do not reject the tradition of written testimony. They readily avail themselves of it, as furnishing rational evidence of the genuineness of the books of scripture; that is, that they were written by the inspired men whose names they bear. I call it rational evidence, for it rises no higher. The belief of what this proves, is not the faith of the gospel; but it is evidence which satisfies reasonable men that there is no imposition in the matter; and that these books are really what they profess to be,—a record of facts and doctrines concerning Jesus Christ, written by men whom he commissioned to publish his doctrine to the world.

If I were writing against avowed infidels, it would be incumbent upon me to prove that the apostles were inspired; but this is admitted by Dr Milner; and therefore all that I have to show, is, how the tradition of written testimony affords rational evidence that the books which bear their names were written by them. Now of this there is the written testimony of a host of authors, both friends and enemies of Christianity, who, while differing about many things, agree in this, that there were certain books received by Christians, not of the church in Rome only, but all over the world, as undoubtedly written by the apostles. Some of these authors were contemporary with men who had been cotemporary with some of the apostles; and they have incorporated in their writings many passages which assure us, that they had the very same narratives and epistles that we have in the New Testament. We know it to be impossible that forgeries should have gained such universal credit then, because we know it to be impossible now; human nature being the same, and the laws of moral evidence the same in all ages.

About the middle of the seventeenth century, "one Milton,"—I use the language of a contemporary author,—"one Milton wrote a poem about the fall of man, which contained some very good lines." This poem was published in Milton's lifetime, acknowledged by him as the author, and not claimed by any other; but it was little known for about half a century; that is, until the days of the Spectator, when Addison brought it into notice by an exposition of its excellences. Almost every critic since that time has noticed it, and made extracts from it; and no one has ever called in question the genuineness of Paradise Lost, as a writing of Milton. There is therefore a moral certainty, as great as the nature of the thing admits of; and the fact has become so identified with English literature, that, supposing our language to exist, living or dead, a thousand years hence, it will be believed then, with as much certainty as it is now, that Paradise Lost was written by one John Milton. No man doubts that the poems ascribed to Virgil are genuine; because the fact is identified with the literature of the Augustan age; so, while there are in the world any traces of English literature, no man can reasonably doubt the genuineness of the poem of Milton. Upon the same principle, but with stronger evidence, the apostolic writings are proved to be genuine; for they were delivered to both individuals and churches while the writers were alive. By these individuals and churches they were preserved, and became incorporated with the literature of the age immediately following, which it was impossible for forgeries to be; and thus the unanimous testimony of the writers of that age assures us of the genuineness of the apostolic writings.

This is called the tradition of written testimony; and it furnishes abundant evidence of the fact for which it is adduced;—such evidence as no man can resist, without denying the principles by which he would judge of evidence with regard to any thing else. We receive the holy scriptures, therefore, as demonstrated to be the writings of the inspired men whose names they bear, altogether independently of the authority of the Church of Rome and her traditions, because they were identified with the literature of the period before the Church of Rome was distinguished above other churches. It is impossible that writers of the next century can furnish stronger evidence of the genuineness of Paradise Lost, than that which is already on record; so it was impossible that the Church of Rome, after the fourth century, when she began to assume authority over other churches, could add to the evidence in favour of the apostolic writings which had been established beyond all dispute in the second and third centuries.

Such is the use which Protestants make of tradition; and that it is very different from that of the Papist must be evident to every child who can read the statement. I shall, however, for the sake of illustration, give an example that resembles their tradition, and that also by referring to a great poet. My readers have all, no doubt, heard of Ossian, the son of Fingal. Tradition says, that this Fingal was a great king in Scotland or Ireland, it is not certain which, somewhere between a thousand and two thousand years ago; and that his son Ossian composed many songs in Gaelic, which were handed down by word of mouth, from age to age, till about fifty years ago when one Macpherson took them down in writing, from the lips of some old men and women, and translated them into English. This was genuine oral tradition, down to the date of the said writing and translation. But I suppose no man, who understands the nature of moral evidence, considers it proved, by the publication of these poems, that they were all, or any of them, written by a prince whose name they bear. Had they been written by Ossian, and received as his, without contradiction by contemporary writers, or by writers of the immediately succeeding age, the genuineness of them would have been established beyond dispute; but as the case stands, no man can entertain a rational conviction that what we have as the poems of Ossian, were, bona fide, composed by a great prince of that name. Much less will he consider them as containing an authentic record of historical facts. There may be many facts in them, but from the necessary uncertainty of oral tradition, and the want of corroborating testimony, no man can possibly tell what is fact, and what is fable; because, from failure of memory on the one hand, and national vanity on the other, much must be omitted, and many things exaggerated; not to speak of what poetry may have invented.

There may have been such a king as Fingal. There may have been such a prince as Ossian; and he may have been a great poet. Nay, I will go further, and admit, that there is a strong probability of these things; for I can no more believe that Macpherson fabricated these poems than that Ossian composed them all. I will even admit, that it is probable that fragments of songs composed by one Ossian may have been preserved for hundreds of years by oral tradition, and that we have some of these in English in Macpherson's book. Many passages there are of great beauty, pathos, and sublimity,—worthy of the son of the "mighty chief of Morven, the first of a thousand kings." But bare probability is the utmost that the evidence can produce in the mind of a serious inquirer after historical truth. And this is all that Popish oral tradition can effect; and that only with regard to things not contrary to scripture; so that no wise man will build any article of faith or ordinance of worship upon such an uncertain foundation.

We do not receive the apostolic writings upon authority so vague, as Dr Milner would insinuate; for besides their being written at first, which puts them out of the rank of oral traditions, the substance of them was speedily incorporated with other writings, which remain to this day as witnesses of the fact, insomuch that a modern author is said to have boasted, that though the New Testament were lost, he could almost make it up from the works of the Greek and Latin fathers. I will allow this to be a figure of speech bordering on the hyperbole; but it is founded upon the fact, that the works of the fathers of the first four centuries, whose genuineness nobody denies, are full of quotations from the very bible which we possess. I am not referring to these fathers as authorities for any doctrine, but merely as competent witnesses of the fact, that the scriptures were received by all Christians before the Church of Rome was distinguished above other churches; and therefore we do not receive them on the authority of either her or her traditions.

That faith in the word of God which constitutes a man a Christian, is founded on higher authority than even the tradition of written testimony, which produces only a rational conviction, not a divine faith. But this, I hope, will appear a sufficient answer to Dr Milner's assertion, that we are obliged to admit of tradition (in his sense of the word of course) in order to admit of scripture itself. For an illustration of the other topic, how we know the bible to be the word of God independently of human testimony, I refer the reader to No CXXXIV.

I conclude this branch of the subject with remarking, that Popish authors claim great merit on the part of their church for having kept the bible so carefully for us, for so many ages, and for giving it to the world at last; but these writers forget that the word of God was not given to the churches to be kept up, but to be given away and published: and it appears to me, that in using this plea of merit, the Church of Rome appears in as awkward a predicament as the "wicked and slothful servant" did, who boasted that he had hid his Lord's talent in a napkin.

I come now to consider the things which Dr Milner says Protestants have received from tradition. "The first precept in the bible," says he, "is that of sanctifying the seventh day." He proves this at length by the first institution of the Sabbath, and by the fourth commandment in the decalogue,—a thing which no Protestant requires to be proved. Then he proceeds:—"On the other hand, Christ declares that 'he came not to destroy the law, but to fulfil it,' Matt. v. 17. He himself observed the Sabbath; and, as his custom was, he went into the synagogue on the Sabbath-day, Luke iv. 16. His disciples likewise observed it, after his death: they rested the Sabbath-day, according to the commandment, Luke xxiii. 56. Yet, with all this weight of scripture authority for keeping the Sabbath or seventh day holy, Protestants of all denominations make it a profane day, and transfer the obligation of it to the first day of the week, or Sunday. Now what authority have they for this? None whatever, except the unwritten word, or tradition of the Catholic Church; which declares that the apostles made the change in honour of Christ's resurrection, and the descent of the Holy Ghost, on that day of the week." Letter XI. p. 96.

Dr Milner must have been thinking of the manner in which Papists keep their holy days, when he spoke about Protestants making the seventh day, or Saturday, a profane * day. It is well known that the holy days of the Church of Rome are the most wicked and profane of all the year, at least after mass, which is always celebrated early; but consistent Protestants, I mean real Christians, have no profane days; but consider themselves bound to live to the glory of God as much on one day as another; and while following their lawful business on ordinary days, they are as really obeying the commandment, as when they meet for religious worship on the Sabbath.

But while thus asserting the duty of Christians to serve God every day, I am far from denying the special obligation of the Sabbath. There was divine wisdom and goodness in the appointment of a day to recur at short intervals, when we should have the privilege of withdrawing from secular affairs, and be allowed, without the interruption of these, to apply our minds to the contemplation of heavenly things, to observe divine ordinances, and enjoy the benefit of Christian fellowship. The obligation of sanctifying such a day, or devoting it to the service of God, with a special reference to spiritual things, is not only admitted, but maintained by serious Christians of every denomination.

The proportion of time to be so consecrated, is fixed by divine authority to be one day in seven. The seventh day was originally appointed for the reason assigned at the institution of the Sabbath, and repeated in the fourth commandment. Because on that day God rested from all his works, it was a significant memorial of his rest, as well as a suitable portion of time for his creatures to rest from their labour; for it had respect not only to the spiritual exercises of rational and immortal beings, but also to the recruiting of the physical strength of man and the inferior creatures, which would soon be exhausted by hard labour, without the stated and frequent recurrence of a day of repose. But, except as a memorial of the rest after the creation of the world, there is no stress laid upon one particular day of the seven more than another. The commandment does not say, "Remember the seventh day;" but "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy;" that is, remember the day of rest, as the word signifies; then the seventh day is mentioned from its connection with the first creation, as the proper day to be observed by the church under that dispensation; and so it was observed by the Jews in all their generations, and by Christ's disciples, after his crucifixion, but before his resurrection; for after that event, we have no notice of them observing the seventh day, or Jewish Sabbath. Thereafter, the first day of the week was that on which the disciples came together for prayer. Christ in person consecrated this day by meeting with his disciples once and again before his ascension. The day of pentecost was the first day of the week, as we learn from the appointment of that festival, which was ordained to be the day after the Sabbath, Lev. xxiii. 16. On this day the disciples were met, before the Holy Ghost came upon them, and therefore that day was not ordained in honour of his descent. So far as the history of the apostles goes, they continued to observe the first day of the week; and Paul in writing to the Corinthians mentions that as the day of their stated meeting. 1 Cor. xvi. 2.

It is true, there is no positive precept which enjoins the keeping of the first day instead of the seventh; but apostolic example is as good as precept. We are sure that what the apostles did, and instructed the churches to do, must have been agreeable to the will of God; for they acted, as well as spoke and wrote, under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit. These considerations, I hope, will be found sufficient to expose the impudence of the assertion, that we have nothing but the authority of tradition for observing the first day of the week as the Christian Sabbath.

Dr Milner then mentions some circumstances relating to the observance of the Sabbath, in which we do not exactly follow the rule prescribed to the Jews; such as keeping it from evening to evening. "Again," says he, "it is declared in scripture to be unlawful to dress victuals on that day, Exod. xvi. 23, or even to make a fire, Exod. xxxv. 3." And then he gives us to understand, that we learn by the traditions of the church that these circumstances were only of temporary obligation. With regard to the first,—that of keeping the Sabbath from evening to evening,—this was merely prescribing an entire day according to the mode of calculating other days; and therefore it is observed by Christians when they keep a whole day according to the same rule.

Dr Milner's other remark seems intended to inform us, that there is less strictness required in the observance of the Christian, than there was of the Jewish Sabbath; and this we learn by the tradition of the church; and I grant there is a very prevalent tradition to that effect, which influences the opinion and even the practice of many Protestants. But I am not aware of any foundation for this in scripture; and therefore I must object to it as a human tradition calculated to make void the law of God. I know indeed that by the law of Moses the Sabbath-breaker was put to death; but that does not infer that more strictness of observance was required; for we know that conjugal infidelity was also punished with death, which certainly does not infer that Christians may be less strict in that respect than Jews were. The law of Moses ordained also that idolaters should be put to death. Happily for Papists, this is not obligatory upon Christians; and yet there is no less strictness required in keeping ourselves from idols. The truth is, there was a system of jurisprudence, or municipal law, bound up with the ordinances of worship, and the law of the ten commandments; for in Israel the nation and the church were identical. The distinction of church and state was unknown. It was not a civil establishment of religion; but a divine establishment of polity,—the head of which, both in spirituals and temporals, was Jehovah the God of Israel. It follows as a thing of course, that with the consummation of that dispensation both the ritual and municipal branches of the law terminated; and left for us under the New Testament, nothing of the nature of precept but the original law of the ten commandments, which Christ exemplified and magnified by his obedience and suffering, and delivered as the rule of conduct to all the subjects of his kingdom;—not in any respect mitigated, or requiring less strictness than before; but requiring the entire devotion of the heart and life to the service and glory of God;—not as the price of any spiritual benefit, but as an expression of love and gratitude for spiritual blessings already received by the gospel.

* I am aware that this word is used in the sense of secular, or not sacred, as we say, profane history; but I must protest against such a word coming into use in reference to any part of Christian practice.

Now, when Christ taught his disciples that this law was much more strict than they were aware of, and that it extended to the very thoughts of the heart, is it to be supposed that he made a special exception in prejudice of the fourth commandment, "Thou shalt remember the Sabbath-day to keep it holy?" Certainly not; for the sanctification of that day is enjoined in the strictest manner, in the summary which Christ gave of the first table of the law, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and soul, and mind, and strength." Christ did indeed reprove the Pharisees for their affected hypocritical strictness about the Sabbath. This was not because he was less strict than they; but because he saw that their professions were insincere and inconsistent. He told them that it was lawful to do good on the Sabbath-day, though it should require great labour, such as the lifting an ox out of a pit; that the law had always admitted of this, and other acts of humanity and mercy; and that the Jews had been in the habit of doing so without blame, when occasion required.

Those precepts about the Sabbath therefore, such as the length of a journey, and other matters, not expressed in the commandment, are not binding upon us; but the commandment itself I hold to be binding in all its extent and original strictness.

No. CXCII.

SATURDAY, March 16th, 1822.

In my last Number I replied to Dr Milner's assertion, that we had nothing but the authority of tradition for observing the Sabbath on the first, instead of the seventh day of the week; and also to what he says about the obligation of observing it, being less strict under the New Testament dispensation than it was under that of Moses. I showed, that for the observance of the first day we had the example of the apostles, and of the churches which they planted, which is of equal authority with any precept; and as for the sanctifying of the Sabbath, I endeavoured to show, that the fourth commandment remains in full force, and in all its original strictness.

In comparing the two dispensations, we find, indeed, that in this as in other respects, the law of Moses lays more stress upon things external and visible, than the New Testament does, which regards more the spirit of the thing than its outward circumstances. But this, so far from being a reason why we should pay less respect to the Sabbath, is rather an argument for greater strictness, seeing that by the greater spirituality of the new dispensation, we are brought into more intimate contact with spiritual and heavenly things. This strictness does not consist in measuring how far we may lawfully travel; or in forbearing to kindle a fire, which in some climates is as much a work of necessity as putting on one's clothes; but it consists in the abstraction of both body and mind from our ordinary worldly employments; devotion of heart to the service of God; personal attendance on the ordinances of his worship; and as much labour as we are capable of, in doing good to fellow-creatures, especially by communicating the knowledge of Christian doctrine to our families, to our neighbours, and all to whom we have access.

Serious Christians regard the service of the Sabbath not as a burden but as a privilege; and the more strictly they observe it in the spirit of it, the greater blessing they find it. This is a matter of experience and individual consciousness which will not be comprehended by those who require arguments to convince them that they may not lawfully take liberties with that holy day, or that think they need not keep it so holy as the Jews did. We are able to judge of the state of religion in any society from their observance of the Sabbath. If they are spiritually minded, they will punctually and cheerfully attend to the exercises proper for the day; but if they are carnal, they will begin to say, "What a weariness is it?" and, by and by, they will make it, in more senses than one, what Dr Milner calls, a profane day. This has been eminently the case in the Church of Rome for hundreds of years. Popish countries on the Continent, and the more Popish parts of Ireland, are notorious for Sabbath profanation; and the contagion of their example has infected Protestants who live among them, or in neighbouring states; so that what was mercifully intended for the benefit of man and beast, is turned to the injury of both, and what was appointed for the worship of God, has been turned to the service of the devil. Papists have no idea of sanctifying the Sabbath further than attending mass in the morning, and perhaps hearing a short discourse which they call Christian doctrine. After that, in countries where they are not under legal restraint, particularly in some parts of Ireland, the day is spent in gaming, drinking, and fighting; so that instead of repairing the exhaustion of the week's labour, they are more exhausted by the revelry of that day than by all the labour of the week.

It is worthy of remark here, that when our kings of the Stuart line had a hankering after Popery, and wished to put down Puritanism, they adopted the expedient of desecrating the Sabbath. Thus James I. of England affected to think it hard that his good subjects after they had been at church, should sit the remainder of the Sunday, moping at their bibles, or teaching their children their catechism. He therefore, out of his royal bounty, and great regard for their welfare, issued a proclamation, giving them liberty to spend the day, after public worship, in the noble exercises of leaping, dancing, wrestling, archery, and such like; and he commanded the ministers of all parish churches to read this proclamation, after sermon on the Sundays; which was such a burlesque of sacred things, that we should scarcely credit the fact, were not the proclamation itself extant, and were there not an ample record of the sufferings of many godly ministers who refused to read to their congregations, on the Lord's day, this book of sports, as it was called: which was revived and reinforced by Charles I. who had the same object in view; and who, though not a Papist himself so far as appeared, was under the influence of a Popish queen and a host of Jesuit priests, who did every thing in their power to banish true religion from the kingdom; and who knew well that they could not do this till they had banished the Sabbath.

I have indulged myself in a digression, which I hope will not be considered an idle one, seeing it arose out of my exposure of Dr Milner's sophistry, and the subject is of great importance.

I proceed now in my explanation of those things which Dr Milner says Protestants have received from tradition. He quotes the law with regard to eating blood, which he says was confirmed by the apostles; and by them "imposed upon the Gentiles who were converted to the faith, Acts xv. 20. Nevertheless," says he, "where is the religious Protestant who scruples to eat gravy with his meat or puddings made of blood? At the same time, if it be asked, Upon what authority do you act in direct contradiction to the express words of both the Old and New Testament? he can find no other answer than that he has learned from the tradition of the church that the prohibition was only temporary," p. 97.

I do not know any Protestant who would give such an answer to such a question; but I do know many religious Protestants who scruple to eat blood, and who consider the commandment to abstain from things strangled and from blood, as of permanent obligation. I admit there are others who think differently, but they do not rest their opinion upon any tradition of the Church of Rome. In the primitive churches there were many questions agitated about meats;—that is, about what might, and what might not be eaten. The apostle Paul told them, that the kingdom of heaven did not consist in these things; but in righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost, Rom. xiv. 17. and that a man might lawfully eat of any thing that he bought in the market, or what was set before him on the table of an unbelieving neighbour, unless he was informed that it was connected with the worship of some idol; in which case he was to have nothing to do with it, lest he should give countenance to idol worship, 1 Cor. x. 25—27. This was the general rule laid down for the conduct of Christians; and it seems to admit of as much latitude as any man could wish. The habits of Jews and Gentiles, however, had been so different with regard to these things, that when they became united in Christian congregations, it was necessary, for the sake of peace and edification, that they should concede something to each other. The Jews were required to concede to the Gentiles the article of circumcision, and not to insist upon subjecting them to that rite, while they were allowed to practise it among themselves, if they pleased; and the Gentiles were required to concede to the Jews abstinence from things strangled, and from blood, and from fornication, all which were connected with idol worship; and these concessions on both sides were absolutely necessary for the peace and edification of the churches. The last article being a precept of the moral law, there can be no question about the perpetual obligation of it; though from previous habits, connected with their former religion, the Gentiles were apt to think fornication scarcely, if at all, a crime; but the rest, which relates merely to an article of food, or to the manner of killing and preparing food for the table, is not so clearly a standing law of the kingdom of heaven, in which such liberty as the following is allowed:—"One believeth that he may eat all things: another who is weak eateth herbs. Let not him that eateth despise him that eateth not; and let not him who eateth not judge him that eateth; for God hath received him," Rom. xiv. 2, 3.

On the general subject of meats and days, the rule which the same apostle prescribes, is, "Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind;" which shows that the things are indifferent: and not matters of moral obligation or positive institution; for with regard to these no such latitude is ever allowed in the word of God. Paul himself could eat flesh without scruple; and yet he says:—"If meat cause my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest I cause my brother to offend," 1 Cor. viii. 13. This was in the true spirit of Christian charity and liberality. Upon this principle, I suppose it was, that the Gentile converts were required to forbear what must have been insufferably offensive to their Jewish brethren. And yet I am not so certain that this was the sole reason, or that there is no speciality in the case, as to say, those persons err, who consider the precept as binding upon them.* There is no sin in forbearing to eat blood; and he who has the least doubt about the lawfulness of it, does wisely to forbear. On either side of the question we derive no more light from Dr Milner's tradition than from the man in the moon.

I am not sufficiently acquainted with the arts of killing and cooking, to know what proportion of blood may be incorporated with the gravy of a beef-steak; and I cannot allow myself to think that this is, or ever was a religious question, or a matter that should affect a man's conscience. The command, in all its strictness, certainly applied to the family of Noah, and to the children of Israel; but it does not necessarily imply more than that the blood be drained from the veins of the animal in the ordinary manner, and not suffered to incorporate with the flesh, as in the case of an animal dying of strangulation, or dying a natural death: and while I admit that the Jews are more particular in extracting the blood than we are, if that be blood which we have in the gravy of beef, I believe it impossible to extract it entirely; and therefore if this was implied in the precept, it must have been a prohibition of flesh altogether, which we are sure it was not; for the commandment to abstain from the blood was originally given with the permission to eat flesh.

Dr Milner and my other Popish readers will affect to triumph at the uncertainty which I have admitted to exist with regard to the obligation of what appears to be an apostolic injunction. They will say, where is the boasted perfection of your rule—the bible alone? and they will tell us how happy they are, seeing they have the living voice of the church, which assures them that the prohibition of blood-eating was only temporary. Now, though this living voice may produce silent submission in those who respect such authority, it does not produce conviction in the mind of any man; and therefore it is of no use. Allowing the church, that is, the priests, to be successors of the apostles, they cannot, even on their own principles, claim more authority and power in their living voice than the apostles had in theirs. Now it is a fact that the living voice of the apostles, with all the miraculous powers which they possessed, did not produce unanimity on such points as these; and they did not desire such unanimity without conviction. If submission to mere authority was ever imperative upon any man, it must have been on those to whom the apostles spoke. Yet we do not hear them assuming this tone of authority; or saying, You must all be of one mind about what may, and what may not be eaten. They left every one to act according to his own convictions, only requiring that he would allow his brother the same liberty: "for neither if we eat are we the better; neither, if we eat not are we the worse," 1 Cor. viii. 8. The truth is, the kingdom of heaven does not consist in these things; and to be all of one mind about them, is not more necessary than to be all of one stature.

Thus, by taking the written word alone as our rule, we are at least as much agreed in sentiment as those were who heard the living voice of the apostles, with all the advantage of repetition and oral explanation. The Church of Rome cannot do more by her living voice; and therefore her children have no advantage over those who consult the scriptures. In these we read what the apostles wrote; and it is a matter of fact, that the reading of their words produces as much unanimity now, as the literal hearing of it did when they were upon earth. All that the Church of Rome effects by her authoritative dogmatizing is submission without conviction, which is the union of slaves bound together by one chain: but the written word of God, like the preaching of the apostles, produces a union of individuals personally convinced of the truth of the gospel, and so united in affection that they can suffer every one to follow his own convictions about matters in which the kingdom of heaven does not consist. This is the union of free and rational beings; and I suppose it is as much as Christians will ever attain in this world.

I must try to get over this ground a little faster.—"I will confine myself," says Dr Milner, "to one more instance of Protestants abandoning their own rule, that of scripture alone, to follow ours, of scripture explained by tradition. If an intelligent Pagan who had carefully perused the New Testament were asked;—Which of the ordinances mentioned in it, is most explicitly and strictly enjoined? I make no doubt but he would answer that it is, the washing of feet."—After referring to John xiii. with remarks, he proceeds;—"I now ask, on what pretence can those, who profess to make scripture alone the rule of their religion, totally disregard this institution and precept? Had this ceremony been observed in the church, when Luther and the other first Protestants began to dogmatize, there is no doubt but they would have retained it: but having learned from her that it was only figurative, they acquiesced in this decision, contrary to what appears to be the plain sense of scripture," pp. 97, 98.

* On this side of the question I have great pleasure in recommending a Lecture on Acts xv. by Mr Ewing of Glasgow, published about twenty years ago. The reader will find that there is a difference between the sentiments above expressed, and those of my esteemed friend and pastor; and yet, I suppose, there are not two men in the world more of one mind with regard to every article of faith and ordinance of worship.

It is not of much importance to inquire what Luther would have done in the case supposed. It is well known that he retained a good deal of the nonsense which he learned in the Church of Rome; and it would have been very surprising if he had not, considering the firm hold that established and long venerated custom had upon his mind. But does Dr Milner not know, that this ordinance of washing feet was then, and is still, observed in the Church of Rome? He certainly does know,—for all the world knows the fact,—that on certain solemn occasions, the Pope, to show his great humility, washes the feet of twelve poor men, when they are as clean as his own fingers; but which he pretends to wash, in imitation of what Christ did to his disciples. I suppose Dr Milner, living in England, is ashamed to acknowledge the fact which presents his holy father in such a ludicrous light, and therefore he writes as if there were no such thing.

I admit that what Christ did on that occasion had a figurative meaning;—that when he said, "If I wash thee not, thou hast no part in me," he meant something more important than the mere application of water to the feet of the disciple; but I do not admit what Dr Milner says the church teaches,—"that it was only figurative." I do not say that Christ appointed the washing of feet as an ordinance, as Dr Milner insinuates; but I think he did this as an example to his disciples; and that as an example it is binding upon us, and upon all Christians to the end of the world, not merely as to the specific act of washing the feet, but as to that which such an action signified; namely, hospitality and kindness to our brethren, especially to those who are going from place to place in the service of Christ, and the ministry of the gospel. In reference to this washing of feet, Christ says, "I have given you an example, that you should do as I have done to you;" that is, an example for your imitation. When instituting an ordinance, he does not say, Imitate my example, or, Do as I have done; but, "THIS DO in remembrance of me," in which the actions of eating bread and drinking wine are specifically appointed; and no others will be acknowledged as obedience to the ordinance. But an example admits of latitude, and may be imitated in the spirit of it by a great variety of actions.

In eastern countries, in ancient times, persons did not travel, as many do now, in stage coaches and steam-boats; but usually on foot, over scorching sands; and they had not, as our pedestrians have, the benefit of stockings and close shoes, but wore sandals, which covered only the soles of their feet, and were tied with thongs about the ankles. A person thus equipped, coming from a journey, felt that the first thing necessary for his comfort was the washing of his feet; and the performance of this service, or even the furnishing of water for this purpose, being the first kind action which one man was called upon to perform to another who was a stranger, came of course to designate all the duties of hospitality and brotherly kindness. Thus we find the apostle Paul, in his first epistle to Timothy, draws the character of one who was worthy of consideration, as having washed the saints' feet, that is, having been hospitable, which implies every office of kind and brotherly affection; and in this sense Christ's example of washing the feet of his disciples is as binding now as ever it was.

After attempting to prove the certainty of tradition, from the impossibility of any change taking place in the doctrine and practice of the church without opposition, Dr Milner sums up his argument in the following words:—"In a word, there is but one way of accounting for the alleged alteration in the doctrines of the church; that mentioned by the learned Dr Bailey; which is to suppose that, on some one night, all the Christians in the world went to sleep sound Protestants, and awoke the next morning rank Papists!" p. 112.

Dr Milner is welcome to claim for the Church of Rome all the Christians of the world, meaning, I suppose, worldly Christians; and I hope he will allow me to claim for the Protestant churches, all who are not of the world, but chosen out of it, as Christ says his disciples were. But passing this, I beg to remind the reader that a similar argument was used by my correspondent, W. D. and fully answered in page 308; in which I showed that the Church of Rome had most certainly deviated far from the right line of truth, and that it was not necessary to trace and mark every step of such deviation. Without repeating what was then said, I now observe, that Dr Milner has furnished me with an argument, that completely overthrows his own. He tells us, page 101, on the authority of a divine of the Church of England, what is pretty well known to be the fact, that the Church of Geneva has departed from the doctrine which Calvin taught: and adopted principles very different from those so zealously maintained by their fathers. How is this possible? When did the change take place? There is only one way of accounting for it; which is, that, on some one night, the Genevese Christians went to bed sound Calvinists, and awoke the next morning rank Socinians! Dr Milner himself must allow that this supposition is as good as Dr Bailey's, and yet it is of no weight when opposed to the notorious fact, that a great change has taken place in the Church of Geneva. And this has been tacitly brought about in less than three hundred years of increasing light and knowledge, when every man was able to detect any material deviation from first principles; how much easier then must it have been for a few artful men in the Church of Rome, during more than a thousand years of gross darkness, to effect any change they pleased?

Dr Milner insinuates further, that a change like that in Geneva has taken place among Protestants in general—"Is it demonstrably evident," says he, "from mere scripture, that Christ is God, and to be adored as such? Most modern Protestants of eminence answer, No; and, in defence of their assertion, quote the following among other texts; 'My Father is greater than I.'" If what Dr Milner here asserts were true, I would show how it operated against his argument; but it is false, that most modern Protestants of eminence do as he says; and therefore I only remark upon it, that he, like other Popish writers, seems very willing to serve the cause of Socinianism, when he has an opportunity of throwing in a hint in its favour.

No. CXCIII.

SATURDAY, MARCH 23D, 1822

I HAVE now discussed the principal points contained in what Dr Milner calls the "True Rule of faith;" and I hope I have proved to the satisfaction of every intelligent reader, that Popish tradition is of no value, and that the bible alone is sufficient for the instruction of men in all that which is necessary to be known for their salvation, and in all which they ought to practise for the glory of God, and the benefit of fellow-creatures.

In his twelfth Letter, which is entitled, "Objections Answered," Dr Milner takes leave of this subject, and concludes the first part of his work. Here I think it worth while to give a pretty large quotation of his very words, in order to show what spirit he is of, and what high ground he assumes, as a successor of the apostles, and as a priest of the holy church, which has, it seems, an exclusive patent for possessing and understanding the scriptures:—

"Against the Catholic Rule it is objected," says he, "that Christ referred the Jews to the scriptures: 'Search the scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life, and they are they which testify of me,' John v. 39. Again, the Jews of Berea are commended by the sacred penman, in that they 'searched the scriptures daily, whether these things were so,' Acts xvii. 11.

"Before I enter on the discussion of any part of scripture, with you or your friends, I am bound, dear Sir, in conformity with my Rule of faith, as explained by the fathers, and particularly by Tertullian, to protest against your and their right to argue from scripture; and, of course, must deny that there is any necessity for my replying to any objections which you may draw from it. For I have reminded you, that 'no prophecy of scripture is of any private interpretation;' and I have proved to you, that the whole business of the scriptures belongs to the church. She has preserved them, she vouches for them, and she alone, by confronting the several passages with each other, and by the help of tradition, authoritatively explains them. Hence it is impossible that the real sense of scripture should ever be against her and her doctrine; and hence, of course, I might quash every objection which you can draw from any passage in it by this short reply:—the church understands the passage differently from you; therefore you must mistake its meaning," p. 118. This is telling us in plain language, what the claims of the Church of Rome are, and what she is ready to enforce whenever she shall have acquired power. We have no right to dispute with her; she needs not descend to argue with us; she is the sole judge of the meaning of every text in the bible,—not one of which can have a meaning different from what she is pleased to impose; for "it is impossible that the real sense of scripture should ever be against her and her doctrine!" This is the short and summary argument by which Dr Milner says he "might quash every objection." Then, it may be asked, what is the use of reasoning at all about the matter? Why not silence every objector by the strong arm of power as formerly,—that is, by the stake and the gibbet? for if Papists are convinced that they cannot possibly be wrong, they would be great fools to put their cause to the hazard of an argument.

Such a fool, however, Dr Milner must be; seeing he has written 500 large octavo pages to prove what he says he can prove in little more than five words:—"The church understands" so and so, and that is enough; "it is impossible that the real sense of scripture should ever be against her and her doctrine." But to show that he is generous in his folly, he thus continues:—"Nevertheless, as charity beareth all things and never faileth, I will, for the better satisfying of you and your friends, quit my vantage ground for the present, and answer distinctly to every text not yet answered by me, which any of your gentlemen, or which Dr Porteous himself, has brought against the Catholic method of religion," p. 119.

As a specimen of the manner in which Dr Milner answers to those texts of scripture which are usually adduced against his Rule, take the following :—

" By way of answering your first objection, let me ask you, whether Christ, by telling the Jews to search the scriptures, intimated that they were not to believe his unwritten word, which he was then preaching; nor to hear his apostles and their successors, with whom he promised to remain for ever? I ask, secondly, on what particular question Christ referred to the scripture, namely, the Old Scripture? for no part of the New was then written. Was it on any question that has been, or might be agitated among Christians? No, certainly; the sole question between him and the infidel Jews, was, whether he was, or was not the Messiah? In proof that he was the Messiah, he adduced the ordinary motives of credibility, as they have been detailed by your late worthy rector, Mr Carey, the miracles he wrought, and the prophecies of the Old Testament that were fulfilled in him, as likewise the testimony of St John the Baptist. The same is to be said of the commendations bestowed by St Luke on the Bereans; they searched the ancient prophecies to verify that the Messiah was to be born at such a time and in such a place, and that his life and his death were to be marked by such and such circumstances. We still refer Jews and other infidels to the same proofs of Christianity, without saying any thing yet to them about our Rule or Judge of controversies," pp. 119, 120.

I request the reader to look over the last paragraph again. It is the whole of Dr Milner's answer to what is alleged by Protestants against the Church of Rome, from the words " Search the scriptures," and from the divinely inspired commendation of the Bereans for searching the scriptures daily. And what is the amount of this answer? Just nothing at all. No Protestant ever imagined that what Christ said to the Jews on that occasion, intimated that they were not to believe his word, or that of his apostles; and the starting of this question is nothing but a barefaced evasion of the argument which he felt himself unable to answer.

On this subject I will give Dr Milner an advantage of which he did not know how to avail himself; for I believe he does not understand Greek, that being a branch of learning to which Popish priests have a great aversion, and they are jealous of it, lest it should disparage their infallible Latin Vulgate.* Every Greek scholar knows that what stands in our translation as a command, " Search the scriptures," (ερευνατε τας γραφας) may with equal propriety be read in the indicative, thus,— " Ye search the scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life, and they are they which testify of me; and yet ye will not come unto me that ye may have life." Had Dr Milner known that this is a true and consistent translation of the words, he would no doubt have availed himself of it, seeing it is not a command to search the scriptures, but merely the admission of a fact that the Jews had a practice of doing so; and we know they had many bad practices. I expect the next generation of Popish authors will improve this hint; and they will probably put their argument in this form :—Christ did not command the people to search the scriptures, but complained of their doing so as a gross abuse of sacred things, which did not belong to them but to the priests.

In Christ's words to the Jews, there is the statement of a fact,—they searched the scriptures; and the reason of their doing so, was, that in them they thought they had eternal life. This was a cogent reason for their doing what they did; and on this account I prefer reading the words in the indicative; for the mere thinking a certain line of conduct right is not of itself a sufficient reason for commanding persons to follow it.* But Protestants lose nothing by conceding to the Papists this advantage, which they are too illiterate to find out for themselves; for though the words are not a command to search the scriptures, they prove that the people had a right to do so, which is enough for my present purpose.

Dr Milner, supposing the words to be in the imperative,† and not knowing how to relieve the Jews from the obligation of searching the scriptures, admits the propriety of their doing so; because the question was merely a question among Jews, or between Christ and the Jews; and for the decision of this he admits the propriety of searching the Jewish scriptures. Then surely for the decision of questions that rise among Christians it is proper to have recourse to the Christian scriptures, or the New Testament. This, however, Dr Milner will not admit; for they have the living voice of the church, which they are commanded to hear. Well; the Jews had the living voice of prophets during most of their existence as a nation; they had just had the living voice of John the Baptist; and now they had the living voice of Christ himself, which they were commanded by a voice from heaven to hear; and yet they exercised their right to search the scriptures. Suppose then, for the sake of argument, that the church had a living voice of equal authority, it would not deprive Christians of the right which Christ acknowledged and confirmed, by repeatedly in his discourses referring the people to the scriptures; and which was again confirmed by the apostolic commendation of the Bereans for searching them. But the truth is, the church has no living voice that can speak agreeably to scripture; and therefore it is that she wishes to silence the oracles of God, that her own authority may remain uncontrolled.

* From Mr Grier's Reply, p. 61, I learn that Dr Milner has somewhere avowed his imperfect acquaintance with Greek.

* See Dr Campbell on the passage.

† Since writing the above I have looked into the Douay Bible, and I find the indicative reading of the passage mentioned in a note, though the imperative is retained in the text. Still it is probable few Papists know this, as they are not very familiar even with their own version.

Dr Milner's answer to other texts are equally unsatisfactory; and I shall not put the reader's patience to the test of going over them all.

Among Dr Milner's "Objections Answered" we read as follows:—"Against the infallibility of the church in deciding questions of faith, I am referred to various other arguments made use of by Dr Porteous; and in the first place to the following:—'Romanists themselves own that men must use their eyes to find this guide; why then must they put them out to follow him?' I answer by the following comparisons. Every prudent man makes use of his reason to find out an able physician to take care of his health, and an able lawyer to secure his property; but, having found these to his full satisfaction, does he dispute with the former about the quality of medicines, or with the latter about forms of law? Thus the Catholic makes use of his reason to observe which, among the rival communions, is the church that Christ established and promised to remain with: having ascertained that, by the plain acknowledged marks which the church bears, he trusts his soul to her unerring judgment, in preference to his own fluctuating opinion," p. 125.

Here it is virtually admitted by Dr Milner, that when men have found this guide which he speaks of, they must put out their eyes, and follow him blindfold; for he does not disavow the principle which the objection implies, but explains and defends it: and this explanation suggests some very humbling and painful reflections. It is both painful and humbling to reflect, that, in this age of knowledge and general improvement, there should exist in England a man capable of seriously maintaining such absurd and slavish principles; and that this man is not a coal-heaver, a scavenger, or doer of night-work; but a Right Reverend Bishop, a D.D. and F.S.A., and a Vicar Apostolic, having spiritual oversight of all the Papists in the midland district of England. Titled, however, and distinguished as he is among the silly sheep of his own pasture, I am persuaded there is not a shepherd to be found upon the mountains of Scotland, who would not be ashamed to say in jest what Dr Milner advances as a solemn and conclusive argument.

This argument, or rather comparison, proceeds upon the assumption that the knowledge of religion is no more a matter of personal interest, than a knowledge of law and physic; and that it is just as proper to trust a priest with the care of souls, as a physician with the health of our bodies, or a lawyer with the security of our property. He affects not to know, or, perhaps rather, he really does not know, that proficiency in physic and law is attainable by only a few, and that at the expense of much labour, time, and money; while the gospel of the grace of God, which brings salvation to the guilty and the perishing, is brought down to the level of the meanest capacity, and presented to all men for acceptance, without money and without price; and for the purpose of their immediate personal enjoyment of its benefits, without the labour and expense of long preparatory study.

In civil society it is right to encourage and respect those who devote their lives to the study and practice of any useful art or science. Providence has so ordered matters, that what is called the division of labour obtains in civilized nations, without any studied effort to produce it. He who studies physic, becomes a skilful physician; he who studies the statutes, and the fundamental principles of jurisprudence, becomes an expert expounder of the law; and those who study the necessary manual arts, become expert tailors and shoemakers. One, who has not studied any of these arts or professions, may, very properly and rationally, trust one with the clothing of his feet; another with the covering of his back; one with the drawing of a tooth; and another with the drawing of his last will;—because all these are mere matters of this world, which no man is obliged to study or practise, unless he has chosen them as his profession. But the concerns of a man's soul,—the business of his personal salvation,—is what he cannot devolve upon another. This is a matter which every man must understand for himself. There is neither salvation nor damnation by proxy. The word of God addresses men as individuals:—"If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me; and him that cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out,"—are the gracious words of Christ addressed to men as individuals;—and to all men without distinction. It is with God himself directly that men have to do. It is Him that we have offended by our sins; it is He who has provided the remedy by sending the Saviour to die for us; it is He who says, "whosoever believeth in Him shall not perish but have everlasting life;" it is to Him that we must answer, each one for himself, for the reception which we give to this good news; and it is according to the reception which men give to the gospel, that they are thus personally and pointedly addressed:—"If thou be wise, thou shalt be wise for thyself: but if thou scornest, thou alone shalt bear it," Prov. ix. 12.

What horrible presumption and impiety is it, therefore, in Dr Milner, to teach his poor deluded flock, that they may safely trust their souls to the unerring judgment of the Church; that is, to such men as himself, for we all know, that by the church he means the priests? This indeed he confesses in the paragraph which immediately follows:—"Most likely the Catholic peasant learns the doctrine of the church from his parish priest; but then he knows that the doctrine of this priest must be conformable to that of his bishop, and that otherwise he will soon be called to account for it: he knows also that the doctrine of the bishop himself must be conformable to that of the other bishops and the Pope; and that it is a fundamental maxim with them all, never to admit of any tenet but such as is believed by all the bishops, and was believed by their predecessors, up to the apostles themselves." P. 126. What a variety of things this peasant must know!—more indeed than any man ever knew or will be able to prove while the world stands!—and yet he is not called to trouble himself about the knowledge of any thing; but to trust his soul to the unerring judgment of the church, in preference to his own fluctuating opinion. Suppose he were to endeavour to understand what he is here said to know about what his priest teaches,—which agrees with the bishop's teaching, which agrees with that of all the bishops, and with the Pope and his predecessors, up to the apostles,—he would find himself lost in an inextricable labyrinth; for where would he find information upon all these points? The longest term of human life would not be sufficient for the purpose;—while in one hour he might learn from the gospel all that is needful for the salvation of his soul:—

> "O how unlike the complex works of man > Heaven's easy, artless, unincumber'd plan!"

Dr Milner propounds his doctrine as if there were no alternative between a man's implicitly trusting in the church, and following "his own fluctuating opinion." But the Christian follows or trusts in neither the one nor the other. His trust is in the word of God, and in the teaching of his Holy Spirit, who guides into all truth,—into the knowledge of all things necessary for the present comfort and eternal salvation of those who receive the divine testimony; to whom he gives an understanding to know him who is true, and to be in him who is true; even in his Son Jesus Christ; "this is the true God and eternal life."

But it must be inquired, how the Papist by his reason finds out "the church that Christ established, and promised to remain with?" It is by certain "plain acknowledged marks which the church bears," as Dr Milner tells us. Where are these marks to be found? This is rather a troublesome question; for, in order to give an answer, Papists are constrained to refer to the bible, in which they say, there are certain marks by which Christ's true church may be distinguished. This is true enough: but if a man read the bible carefully, and take the words in their plain grammatical meaning, he will not find one mark of the Church of Rome there, except under the character of an enemy and an Antichrist. It is as if conscious of this, that the Popish priests have such an abhorrence of bible-reading. If they believed that their religion was founded on the word of God, they would invite every man to search the scriptures for himself, and satisfy himself that theirs was the true religion. This is what all Protestants do; which is a prima facie evidence in their favour. Whether right or wrong, this indicates an honest persuasion that the word of God is on their side. But when the Church of Rome refers to the scriptures in support of her claims, and at the same time prohibits the free and general reading of them, it shows that she does not believe her own doctrine, but is conscious that she is deceiving the people.

After all, what is the use of the Church of Rome's referring to the bible, when she tells us that she is the sole judge of what the bible teaches?—that whatever a passage may seem to express, we must certainly mistake it, unless we understand it exactly as the church does? Since the ultimate appeal must always be to her judgment, we may as well take her word at once, without going to the bible; and this is, in fact, the very point she wishes to establish; and which she has established in the minds of her dutiful children. To speak of the bible at all, then, is no better than her other impositions. In her mouth a proof from the bible is proving a thing by itself; for it is her mouth that decides its meaning; and this is no evidence at all. Or, when she speaks of the bible as the word of God, she tells us that we know this only on her authority; and then she refers us to the bible to prove that she has such authority, which involves the absurdity of proving two unproved things by each other. The Church of Rome points out the true word of God; and the word of God points out her as the true church! which is a circuitous mode of arguing of which any child ought to be ashamed. Yet this is the main bulwark of Popery; and great divines, and learned cardinals, and holy fathers, are not ashamed to argue in this manner.

Dr Milner was perfectly aware that this mode of reasoning would be objected to; and he anticipates the objection, by telling us, that all such circles are not vicious, and that mutual testimony is admissible. Thus John Baptist bore witness to Christ, and Christ bore witness to the Baptist. Yes: but neither of them was a stranger to the people. Had the Jews not known what sort of man John was, his testimony would have been of no weight in favour of Christ; and had they not known something of Christ's character, his testimony on behalf of John would have been of no value with them. But according to the Church of Rome, we know nothing of the bible but through her; and yet she says the bible certifies her to be the only true church, which is only her own certificate at second-hand. In a long note, Dr Milner, by means of similitudes, tries a further vindication of this mode of reasoning; but it will not do. I defy the whole order of Jesuits to reconcile it to common sense; and I am sure I could not reconcile the use of such an argument with common honesty.

No. CXCIV.

SATURDAY, March 30th, 1822.

I HAVE now gone over the first part of Dr Milner's work, which professes to expose the false rules, and establish the true Rule of faith. He thinks he has proved beyond contradiction that this true Rule is scripture and tradition, as propounded and explained by the Catholic Church; that is, the Church of Rome; and that all men ought to submit to her decision, with regard to what they are to believe, and what ordinances they are to observe, under pain of being held accursed as heathens and publicans. It has been my endeavour to show that his proofs are deficient, and his assumptions inadmissible, upon any principle of scripture or common sense; and how far I have succeeded, I leave to the reader to determine.

Dr Milner enters upon the second part of his work with the confidence and assurance, that the principles laid down in the first part are demonstrated by him, and admitted hy his correspondents; particularly, that they ought to hear the church; and James Brown, Esquire, in name of himself and brethren and sisters, is introduced as inquiring, whether they may not as well hear the Church of England as that of Rome. Dr Milner has convinced them that they must give up their own private judgment; that they must not presume to think for themselves what is the import of divine revelation; but leave all to the judgment of some church. Then he congratulates them on the "advance" which they have made "towards the clear sight of the whole truth of revelation;" and tells them that, now having taken the church of God for their guide, they have but one simple inquiry to make— Which is this church? which, he assures them, cannot be the Church of England. So it seems, the only way to come to a clear sight of a thing is to shut our eyes. I think I have heard that this is the way in which some apprentice boys are initiated into the mysteries of their craft. After going through certain ceremonies, they are told to shut their eyes and they will see such and such things; which appears a strange way of acquiring knowledge, and a very foolish way of becoming wise; but unless I had read Dr Milner's work, I could not have believed that a grave doctor and apostolic vicar would have ventured to publish to the world, that this is the right way to obtain a clear sight of the truths of divine revelation.

Dr Milner however admits that we may use our own eyesight till this one question be solved—Which is the true church? After that we have no more use for it. "Hence," says he, "it is as clear as noon day light, that by solving this one question—Which is the true church?—you will at once solve every question of religious controversy that ever has been, or that ever can be agitated. You will not need to spend your life in studying the sacred scriptures in their original languages, and their authentic copies, and in confronting passages with each other, from Genesis to Revelation,— a task by no means calculated, as is evident, for the bulk of mankind:—you will only have to hear what the church teaches upon the several articles of her faith, in order to know with certainty what God hath revealed concerning them. Neither need you hearken to contending sects, and doctors of the present or past times: you will need only to hear the church, which indeed Christ commands you to hear, under pain of being treated as a heathen or a publican, Matt. xviii. 17," p. 3. Part II.

If the reader will turn to the passage in the Gospel by Matthew here referred to, he will find that the command to hear the church relates not to any article of faith or worship; but merely to a matter of personal offence which one man may have given to another; and he who attends to the nature of the thing, will see that the church spoken of must be one which a man can speak to, as well as hear. But I need not repeat what has been so often said about Papists misrepresenting the meaning of this passage. There is not a word in the New Testament that implies a command to hear the church in Dr Milner's sense; and he is guilty of the profanity of wresting Christ's words from their connection, and applying them to a purpose which he did not intend by them. This is however so common with Popish writers, that perhaps he thinks there is no evil in it; though he would be grievously offended with any man who should make so free with his words.

After all, the decision of this one question, which is to settle all other questions, is no easy matter. It is indeed a greater undertaking than any method adopted by Protestants for obtaining a knowledge of the truth. We search the scriptures; and we come to know and understand the doctrines of the gospel one by one, as they are presented to the mind; but the Popish method is, to endeavour to find out where these doctrines lie concealed in a heap, and to gulp them all at once. This requires no ordinary capacity; and it must be the effect of a mightier effort than comparing passages from Genesis to Revelation. If the bulk of mankind are incapable of this, as Dr Milner says, then his method is not calculated for men at all, but for beings of superior powers.

Dr Milner's Rule for settling all controversies by merely finding out which is the true church, reminds me of Mrs ———'s* rules for making hare soup. "First," says she, "catch a hare." Now this first step happens to be the most difficult in the whole process; and to the bulk of cook-maids it is prescribing no less than an impossibility. In like manner Dr Milner prescribes, as the first step, what is impossible to the bulk of mankind; that is, to find out such a true church as he describes; for there never was such a church in the world. I mean a visible, organized, holy, apostolical, and universal church; that is, a holy church embracing a world of sinful creatures; not sinners saved and sanctified; but sinners under the power of their evil passions; and, according to the doctrine of the church itself, so unholy as to die in a state that requires purgation in another world. There is a contradiction in the terms holy and universal, as applied to the church in this world; and it is only in heaven that they will be found applicable to one body.

Dr Milner himself must have been aware of the vast difficulty of settling his first question which is to decide all other questions; for he has written 170 large octavo pages of letter press on this one subject; and I am sure it is a more grievous task to study and understand all these, than to read and understand the holy scriptures. By reading a few pages of the New Testament a man soon comes to the knowledge of the truth by which he will be saved. But supposing him to take every step of Dr Milner's laborious process; and even supposing him to be successful in finding what he sought for, namely, the true church; he has not made one step towards the understanding of the saving truth; for he finds in this church nothing but a confused heap of dogmas, traditions, legends, rites, and ceremonies, which he is commanded to believe and observe, without any regard to his understanding of them; so that, as the fruit of all his labour, he finds himself the mere slave of an authority which he is not permitted to question.

Let us now attend to Dr Milner's marks of the true church, which he propounds rather pedantically, and in great capitals, as follows: —UNITY, SANCTITY, CATHOLICITY, and APOSTOLICITY. It is not my intention to reply to the whole 170 pages which he has written upon these four topics, because I have already discussed them all in some part or other of my work. I broadly deny that the Church of Rome possesses any one of these characters. She is neither united, nor holy, nor catholic, nor apostolical. She is as full of divisions as all the Protestant communions together; she is as full of impiety and impurity as any nation of infidels; she is not so catholic or universal as Heathenism; she possesses no more of the apostolic character than Simon Magus, or Elymas the sorcerer, did. To lead a proof upon all these points would be to repeat what I have proved already under different heads, which the reader will easily find by consulting the table of contents. But it may be useful to give a short condensed view of some points, which I shall endeavour to do in as small a space as possible.

One of the first things,—perhaps, the very first thing,—that constitutes union in a church, is, that all the members acknowledge the same head. Now, on this first point, there is more union among the hundred sects of Protestants than there is in the one Church of Rome. Protestants of every name, with one voice, acknowledge Jesus Christ alone as the Head of his church; and they acknowledge his authority alone in spiritual matters; that is, they will submit their consciences to no other. Even such national churches as acknowledge a head on earth, limit this headship to what is called the "state ecclesiastical," in which sense the king is head of the Church of England. He presides over the temporalities of it; but in matters purely spiritual, an English Episcopalian will maintain the exclusive headship of Christ as firmly as any other Protestant. But the Church of Rome claims to have a spiritual head on earth, which head she believes infallible; and her members submit their consciences in spiritual matters to his supreme authority.

Now, it is very surprising that Papists are not, and never were, agreed as to who this head is; and therefore they are destitute of the first principle of church unity. One party says, it is the Pope; a second makes it a general council; and a third says, it is neither the one nor the other, but both united. But it must be confessed, all parties are somewhat shy in giving an explicit opinion upon the subject. Like the Pharisees of whom Christ asked about the ministry of John,—"Was it from heaven, or of men?" who, perceiving that unpleasant consequences would follow a direct answer on either side, said, they could not tell; so Dr Milner evades the question relating to the infallible head of the church. "Schoolmen," says he, "discuss some such points: but let me ask his lordship, (Dr Porteous) whether he finds any Catholic who denies or doubts that a general council, with the Pope at its head, or that the Pope himself, issuing a doctrinal decision, which is received by the great body of Catholic bishops, is secure from error? Most certainly not: and hence he may gather where all Catholics agree in lodging infallibility. In like manner, with respect to our national constitution, some lawyers hold that a royal proclamation, in such and such circumstances, has the force of a law; others, that a vote of the House of Lords or of Commons, or of both Houses together, has the same strength; but all subjects acknowledge that an Act of the King, Lords, and Commons, is binding upon them; and this suffices for all practical purposes." Part I. p. 130. The Church of Rome proves herself earthly by incessantly attempting to support herself by figures of earthly things; but the legs of such lame figures are never equal; and deductions of this kind from things worldly to things spiritual and heavenly, are seldom better than parables in the mouth of fools.

* I forget the name of the good lady; but some of my readers will recollect in which of the cookery books this Rule is laid down.

So far from telling us who is the infallible head of the Church of Rome, Dr Milner lets us know that he cannot tell. The schoolmen have differed about it; and "who shall decide when doctors disagree?" Hence he puts a question to Bishop Porteous, respecting his own knowledge of what Papists believe on the subject; from which "he may gather where all Catholics agree in lodging infallibility." And this must be nowhere; for all Catholics never agreed about it. Bishop Hay tells us more honestly, that the church has never decided who her infallible head is. He says, it is not a question in which faith is concerned; and that one may believe according as the reasons on each side preponderate. Sincere Christ. chap. xii. Q. 31. Then the Church of Rome is, of all churches in the world, the farthest from unity, seeing she is not agreed as to who is her infallible head. This renders her agreement or disagreement about other matters of no importance whatever.

"For all practical purposes," however, I admit that the bulk of Papists believe the Pope alone to be the infallible head of the church; for they can never know whether or not his doctrinal decisions are "received by the great body of Catholic bishops;" and therefore they have only himself to look to. This brings us back to the question of his supremacy, on which I shall give place to a correspondent, who adduces an argument against the supremacy, which I am sure the Church of Rome will never answer.

TO THE PROTESTANT.

"Sir,—You will highly gratify some of your friends by giving an early publication to the following argument against the supremacy of the Pope, which, as far as I know, is perfectly new. It is one of those numerous erudite exhibitions of talent which have lately been brought forward into public notice by an eminent lecturer * on scripture criticism of our city; and it deserves most particular regard from you in this period of your work, when you are exposing the fallacy of grounding any part of our Christian belief on the traditions of the Church of Rome. The question as now stated by themselves is not, Shall we reject all traditions, or all collateral aid from cotemporary authority, when we proceed to give the true sense of scripture?—for they admit that we do not thus reject traditionary evidence and assistance; but, Shall we advance their traditions to equal or superior authority with the scriptures themselves? The Papists do not venture to impugn the authority of scripture; what they contend for is, to place it on the same level with certain traditions, of which they say that their church has always been the repository; which traditions, they maintain, afford the genuine sense of scripture, and throw light on the whole economy of the Christian revelation. This is the amount of their position: now let us see how they make it out.

It is indispensably necessary for them to make out the supremacy and infallibility of the Papal chair, the oracle which decides concerning their traditions, and all their peculiar rites and doctrines; and in order to this, to deduce this supremacy and infallibility from the apostle Peter, whom our Saviour is held to have intrusted with the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and with the charge and custody of his people. This they must do; for if there be nowhere some supreme and infallible guide, who is visible to our eyes and palpable to all our senses, their oral communications must rest precisely on their own peculiar evidence, and reach no higher estimation than their intrinsic value carries along with them. The Pope's supremacy and infallibility, accordingly, form the corner stone of their system; and it is of such vital importance to it, that if it is not supported on its high, exalted, and pre-eminent place, the system itself must fall to the ground, like the arch when its keystone is removed. Indeed, if the civil and spiritual power of the Pope were deprived of these attributes, it would crumble into nothing, and along with it bring down the whole fabric of Papal delusion. Indeed, his supremacy is so essentially important to the existence of the system, that if once set aside and abandoned, there would not be one tongue to move in defence of these abominations and absurdities that have been palmed on the world under the name of legendary traditions.

Now the argument adduced by this truly eminent critic against the supremacy of the Pope, as derived from the apostle Peter, is this:—St Peter, it is allowed on all hands, suffered martyrdom under the persecution of Nero, about the year of our Lord, 66. It is enough for us at present to assume, that the Papists, from what they hold to be infallible authority, receive this to have been the time of his death. We know, moreover, and scripture testifies the fact, that the beloved apostle John, to whom our blessed Redeemer committed the charge of his mother, lived about 40 years beyond this period, having, during his banishment under Domitian to Patmos, written the Apocalypse; and probably, at or near the same time, his gospel and epistles. Whence it appears, that this eminent apostle not only survived Peter many years, but was most actively and beneficially exercised during that period in the service of the church of Christ. A question thereupon occurs, How did it come to pass that this great apostle did not succeed to the supremacy of the church at the death of Peter, in place of Clement, or Linus, or Cletus, or Anacletus?—Why, seeing his fellow-labourer, with whom he so often and so frequently exerted himself side by side, was removed from the earthly state of things, did not John take up the mantle that was dropped from him, and exercise that supremacy and infallibility on which the main stress of Christian belief was in all ages to depend? Why was he to submit to Pope Clement, and Pope Linus, and Pope Cletus, in the great articles of supremacy and infallibility? Did his high apostolic authority, derived immediately and directly from our only Lord and Saviour, indeed succumb to these orderly supreme Pontiffs, or was there during his life an eclipse of the Papal power? Whatever answer may be attempted to these questions, one thing is most evidently and prominently certain, that the apostle John was eminently qualified to have exercised the great offices attributed to the successors of Peter; and if their offices were so necessary in the church, as Papists say they are, it is wonderful, it is unaccountable, how he should not have been appointed to exercise them, now that Peter was out of the way, and he so well prepared for discharging them with equal or superior influence.

* The Rev. Mr Leech.

But the force of the argument is not spent here. If it was necessary for the apostle John to submit to Pope Clement, or Pope Linus, why did he not manfully defend their authority, enforce the infallibility and supremacy of the new establishment, and give efficacy and force to its dictates by his apostolic power and authority, confirming the same by miracles, and illustrating its efficacy by the accompaniment of gifts and graces, conformably to the original destination of such power and authority? Most certainly such confirmation was much wanted, if Popedom was necessary to give influence to the whole progress of Christian belief. But does the holy apostle thus lend his name or authority to the Popedom and their system of traditions? Does he in his writings, received by all of us as the dictates of inspiration, take no interest in this new yet permanent accession to the Christian church? Does this wonderful establishment, which is to bear legal sway for so many ages, derive no adequate support from his pen, either in the way of reconciling men's minds and feelings to it, or through his stating circumstances to render it congruous with the Christian scheme as already promulgated? Have Papists any tradition to account for that entire neglect of, and disrespect for, their system of supremacy and infallibility which this scheme indicates? Alas! if they could but think and feel rationally, they would hide their faces with shame; for they are not only destitute of this holy apostle's support, but have his whole authority in full array against them.

As Papists now write and reason and appeal to scripture and to common sense in their defences, I will venture to push this whole argument one step farther. The apostle John affords us not only negative but positive proof against the supremacy and infallibility of the Popedom and its traditionary legends.

In the first place, he shows that the Christian faith gives light, and life, and joy;—that its essence is spiritual, and that it is independent of all earthly and secular considerations. Our Saviour's discourses, recorded by him,—his answer to Pilate, his frequent appeals to the spirituality of his kingdom, and to the gift of the Holy Ghost, whose influences are to renew and sanctify the soul, abstractly from all external objects;—these are delicate, but, to sincere lovers of the truth, cogent and irresistible reasonings against the Papacy, in as much as they attack its vital parts, while they allow its carcass to fall to pieces by its own weight. But the apostle proceeds further to depict the grand deceit then going on, or beginning to emerge. He uses the figure of a debauched woman, which he contradistinguishes from one whose love has been purified, and gives birth to the man child who is to rule the nations;—and he at the same time informs us in so many words, that this debauched woman is the Great City which rules over the earth, thereby furnishing us with an unerring clue to distinguish at once her seat and her character. . . . . J. E."

No. CXCV.

SATURDAY, April 6th, 1822.

It is one of the arts of the Romish church to claim for herself with the greatest confidence those good qualities of which she is most notoriously destitute. By bold assertion and incessant repetition she prevails upon her own members at least, to believe that she is what she calls herself, at the expense of refusing the evidence of their own senses. This applies to the article of her unity as well as that of her sanctity or holiness; for no man, who witnesses the evil practices of Papists, can, without discrediting his own senses, believe that she is a holy church; no more can any one, who knows her present state and ancient history, believe that she possesses the quality of union. This Dr Milner lays down as the first mark of the true church, and he challenges the possession of it for his church alone. Now, union by itself is no mark of a true church, for many confederacies of wicked men are very firmly united; for instance, the insurgents in Ireland seem to have but one heart and soul in carrying on their work of massacre and plunder. But, I admit that a church destitute of union is not a true church, at least not a church in a Christian-like state; and this applies to the Church of Rome above all other churches; for, as I showed in my last Number, she is not united in the acknowledgment of one head; and as for the members, they are no more united in sentiment or affection than any other portion of the human race, whether Heathen or Mahomedan.

A degree of union pervades all Protestant churches; I mean union in the acknowledgment of divine truth, and the observance of divine ordinances. This union is not dependent on the organization and connection of any number of congregations in one representative assembly, or under one Patriarch or Pope. In the New Testament we read of many churches which were not so united; and yet they were united in the sense in which church union ought always to exist. There was throughout them all, but one Lord, one faith, one baptism; and this is the case in most Protestant churches at this day;—I should say, in all who have any right to the name of Protestant: and this union appears not merely in their public creeds and formularies,—though it does appear there,—but in what I consider far more important, namely, the union of many thousands of individuals to Jesus Christ and to one another, as members of his body, by the belief of the gospel which is preached among them. Perhaps this cannot be credibly affirmed of all the members of any Protestant church; but among all the churches, "the Lord knoweth them that are his," and who are thus united to himself and to one another; and it is only union in this sense that is of any real permanent value.

In the churches planted by the apostles, I suppose the proportion of members so united to one another and to their common head, was much greater than it has ever been since in any church; and indeed, so far as appears, none were received, or allowed to continue members, who did not give credible evidence of being such; or if in some cases it was otherwise, the churches themselves were subjected to apostolic rebuke. This perhaps accounts for the fact, that these churches, though quite distinct assemblies, were all of one communion; and thus they were more united than Protestant churches are. This was because they were more united in love of the truth, and in affection to one another; not because they were all of one opinion in every thing that they could think and speak about; not because they all practised the very same things, for the Jews observed circumcision and other rites which the Gentiles did not.

If I shall be asked, why Protestant churches are not all of one communion, as the primitive churches were? I answer, without hesitation,—it is because there is a fault somewhere among them; and perhaps it is a fault that pervades them all. I am not like Papists obliged to defend my sect as infallible, at all hazards, and "against all deadly." It is one of the privileges arising out of the Reformation that no man is obliged to approve of all things even in the Reformation itself; but every man is at liberty to express his mind, and to point out errors and mistakes in his own brethren, without giving just cause of offence. I believe the principal reason why Protestants are not all of one communion is, because they have not followed out their own fundamental principle, of the bible, and the bible alone, as the religion of Protestants. When they have all done this, they will be all of one communion, as Christians were at first, without the necessity of being all of one mind about every thing, or all observing precisely the same things, any more than the primitive churches were; and yet they may aproach more nearly to union even in these things than the primitive Christians did, when things indifferent are left as the apostles left those things in which the kingdom of heaven does not consist. The best way to attain union on these points, is, to let their comparative unimportance be on all hands admitted. People will then cease to dispute about them; and controversies among serious Christians will cease from want of matter to dispute about.

But, without being yet all of one communion, it is a fact, that Protestants are more united in their confession of Christian doctrine than Papists are. In other words, there is more variety and contrariety in the doctrines maintained by different orders within the Church of Rome, than there is among all Protestant sects. For the truth of this assertion I have only to refer to the furious controversies between the Dominicans and Franciscans;—the Jesuits and the Jansenists. I need not go into particulars; for the fact is known to every reader of church history; and surely it is more unseemly for the church that professes to be one holy and united body, to have such feuds within its bosom, than for Protestant churches to have controversies while they do not pretend to be so united.

I have adverted to the fact, that, in their creeds and public formularies, Protestant churches are agreed in the leading articles of Christian doctrine; so much so, that a work has been published, and is extant in two thick volumes, containing a collection of Confessions, in which it is proved by the documents themselves, that the faith of the reformed churches, in different nations, is fundamentally and substantially the same, so far as relates to the Christian doctrine, or the way by which a sinner is saved, and taught to live to the glory of God, with the hope of happiness in his presence for ever. This is the sum and substance of Christian knowledge. In this Protestants are agreed. There is therefore more unity in their different communions, than there is in the Church of Rome in her one communion; for on these fundamental points, the canons of councils and decrees of Popes are so discordant, that the poor people do not know whether they are to be saved wholly by Christ, or partly by themselves, and by the merits of saints; and whether Christ has satisfied divine justice for them, or whether they must not satisfy for themselves, either in this world or in purgatory. Now she teaches one thing, and then another; and after all, it turns out that she teaches nothing that can be depended upon; for every man is bound to receive all doctrines from the lips of his priest, though he should know him to be a man neither wiser nor better than himself.

I shall be told that the creeds and formularies of churches are not a criterion by which we can ascertain the present state of religious belief; because in some instances a change has tacitly been effected, like that in the Church of Geneva, as I mentioned in a late Number. This is true as regards individuals in some Protestant churches; but I believe there is, notwithstanding this fact, as much agreement among Protestants as ever there was;—I mean among Protestants who read the scriptures, who think for themselves, and who have received the love of the truth; and it is only the agreement of such that is worthy of the name of Christian union. For the truth of this I have only one humble document to refer to; and perhaps the evidence of it is the stronger, that it never pretended to be, and was never understood by any man to be, an exhibition of the religious belief of any one sect of Protestants;—I mean this same work entitled, THE PROTESTANT. To my certain knowledge it is read and approved of by not a few of the established church in England and Ireland, including some of the hierarchy; and by many more of the Church of Scotland. Among Presbyterian dissenters of all denominations it is generally read and approved; and Independents and Baptists of various classes regard me as a friend, and approve of my sentiments upon the whole, though I have made no account of their distinctive peculiarities. I have not pleaded the cause of any one of these sects; and I do not suppose that every sentiment which I have expressed is approved by all or any of them; but so far as I know, I have not written a sentence which any of them regard as fundamentally erroneous, or inconsistent with the doctrine that Christ and his apostles taught.* Nay, from individuals of all these communions I have letters positively expressing approbation of the principles which I have been maintaining throughout my work; which proves the fact, that thinking religious Protestants are more united in religious belief than they know themselves to be; and the fact leads me to infer, that if serious Christians of all denominations were to meet on the neutral ground of the bible alone, they would find that there was scarcely any difference of sentiment among them.

And I strongly suspect they will ere long find it necessary to meet on this common ground, for mutual defence against the common enemy. Popery is making more rapid strides towards ascendency than most people are aware of. Witness the laborious efforts of the Jesuits in France, under the name of Missionaries, for they have assumed this as a more popular designation, and less liable to excite suspicion than the odious, and, for a time, proscribed, name of Jesuit. Witness also the present Popish rebellion in the south of Ireland. I call it Popish, for not a single Protestant has appeared active in the horrid transactions of the last six months. The Dublin newspaper, "The Antidote," lately published a challenge to the world to name one Protestant who had been implicated, and they have heard of not so much as one. This rebellion will no doubt be put down. The empire is too powerful, and happily too much united to suffer the enemy to prevail; but when it is put down, Catholic emancipation will be again brought forward, and urged as the most effectual means of preventing the recurrence of such outrages. If we may form an opinion from what we hear drop from gentlemen in many companies, and from what is boldly advanced by some of the most popular conductors of the public press, the bait will take. To please the Papists, seeing nothing else will please them, we must break down every barrier that prevents them from acquiring ascendency in Ireland at least: and so, just from a fear of being murdered by them, we will admit them to such power in the state, that it will be at their own discretion whether death, or banishment, or conversion, shall be the lot of all the Protestants in the kingdom.

* It is right to mention here, that I have two correspondents who complain that I have erred exceedingly:—one, because I deny the right of the civil magistrate to punish idolatry; the other, because I admit the lawfulness of eating blood and things strangled, at least have shown a leaning to that side of the question;—but I do not know to what sect either of my correspondents belongs. This, so far as I know, is the sum total of my delinquencies in the esteem of Protestants.

With such things in prospect,—and what man who studies the signs of the times will say there is not a prospect of such things?—every Protestant ought to be ready to unite with every other, for common defence. I am not recommending an armament for the purpose of defence in a military conflict; but the union of all sound Protestants for the defence of the truth in opposition to error, by prayer to God, by propagating the gospel, by education, and circulating every kind of useful knowledge. These are weapons by which the reign of darkness must fall;—by which men will by degrees be withdrawn from the ranks of Popery; and by means of which the system will ultimately be overthrown.

On this subject I am happy to have the concurrence of an author of the first eminence, namely, Dr Owen, in a small tract, republished in the present year, by the Bishop of St David's, and by him dedicated to Mr Wilberforce, and strongly recommended to the attention of that eminent philanthropist, whose great and amiable mind is strangely warped on the subject of Catholic emancipation. This tract was written a short time before the Revolution, when there was a great tendency towards Popery; and the following is suggested as one of the means for preserving the Protestant religion:—"It is also necessary hereunto, that all those who sincerely own this religion, and make it the rule of their living unto God, in hopes of the eternal enjoyment of him in another world, do depose the consideration of the lesser differences amongst themselves, and unite in one common design and interest to oppose the entrances and growth of Popery among us. And it is an hard thing to persuade rational men, that they are in earnest for its opposition and exclusion, who are not willing so to do." A Brief and Impartial Account of the Nature of the Protestant Religion, its present State in the world, its Strength and Weakness, &c. By John Owen, D. D.

Having had the vanity or presumption, call it what you will, to adduce my own work as an evidence of union of sentiment among Protestants, I shall, by way of balancing accounts, adduce the work of my great opponent, as an evidence of the disunion and discord that exist among Papists. I began to write upon my own sole responsibility; and it would not have been surprising if, instead of being generally approved by all sects of Protestants, I had provoked the hostility of all; for this has happened to some authors of great zeal and acuteness, in consequence of their confining their views to some narrow sectarian point. But Mr Andrews, the Catholic Vindicator, was chosen and deputed by persons of his own body, as one qualified to advocate the cause of Popery, and to write down THE PROTESTANT. They had good reason for their choice, for he was highly commended by Dr Milner, whose patronage he seemed to enjoy, and who certifies the orthodoxy and general excellence of some of his writings, particularly his school book. Surely then it might have been expected that all Papists would approve the sentiments of such a writer. But what was the fact? Bishop Cameron declared upon oath, that his writings were not approved by the more respectable of his brethren in Scotland; and as for the bishop's own opinion, he declares he approved "of nothing from that man." He declares also his conviction that Mr Scott did not approve of his writings; and yet it is proved on oath that he exhorted his people in his chapel to buy them. Next, Mr Andrews is introduced as deponing that Mr Scott, as he was informed, first approved and afterwards disapproved of his work; and further that it "was approved by respectable English Catholics," but not "encouraged, as it did not succeed." See Jury Trial, &c. Among other sects there would be no importance attached to these differences of opinion about any human writings; but in the Church of Rome they are of importance as showing that she does not possess the union to which she pretends. There the faith of one is declared to be the faith of all; and Dr Milner challenges us to go to the Royal Exchange in London, and examine Catholics from the four points of the compass, assuring us that they will all confess the same things,—so perfectly is the Church of Rome agreed about every article of faith. But from the instance which I have given, it is certain that at home they are not agreed; and they cannot get out of this dilemma, as they usually do in such cases, by asserting that the controversy was not about articles of faith; for such indeed it was; and Mr Andrews wrote at great length about Transubstantiation and other articles equally important.

The above facts, trifling as they appear, cut deep into Dr Milner's system; for he tells us that the common people receive their religion from their parish priest, knowing that his doctrine must agree with that of his bishop, which must agree with that of all the other bishops. But here incidently we have Bishop Cameron, diocesan of the lowlands of Scotland, and Bishop Milner, vicar apostolic of the midland district of England, directly pitted against each other in reference to another work. Bishop Milner approves, and strongly recommends, the system of religious instruction contained in Mr Andrews' school book, and Bishop Cameron swears that he approves of NOTHING from that man. Then certainly these two bishops are not agreed; most probably the priests under them are also divided; indeed they must be so, seeing every priest is accountable to his bishop for the doctrine he teaches; and what are the poor people to do all this while? How can they know which is the true doctrine of the church? The fact is, they do not, and cannot know any of the matter from the teaching of such guides. The blind lead the blind, and both must fall into the ditch.

But, leaving these local and petty squabbles to be settled between our Scottish and English bishops at their leisure, I remark that the Church of Rome, viewed as a whole, so far from being the most united, is the most schismatical church on the face of the earth. Schism is not the separation of one church from the communion of another, but the creation and maintaining of parties in the same church. The most schismatical church mentioned in the New Testament, was that in Corinth. There was nothing there that in modern language would be called dissent or separation; but Paul tells them that there were divisions (σχισματα, that is, schisms) among them. Now these schisms consisted in this;—One said, I am of Paul; another, I of Apollos; another, I of Cephas; and another, I of Christ, 1 Cor. i. 11, 12. The last party was as bad as any, for it was making Christ the head of a party among Christians, and in opposition to his own faithful apostles. Now, the practice which the apostle condemns in the Corinthian church has prevailed in the Church of Rome for many centuries, with the concurrence of Popes and councils, and it continues in full operation to this day:—One says, I am of Benedict; another, I am of Francis; another, I am of Dominick; and another, I am of Jesus;—and the last is the most wicked of the whole, that is, the Jesuits. These holy fraternities vilify and condemn one another; and when the medicants of different orders used to meet on a begging expedition, they would hold a pitched battle, like as many wild Irishmen on a holiday, of which some edifying examples are to be found, I think in Godwin's Life of Chaucer. This is an example of schism in the true sense of the word; and as nothing like this exists in Protestant churches, we are entitled to call the Church of Rome the only schismatical church in the western world. I challenge Dr Milner to reply to this statement.

But I have a still heavier charge against the Church of Rome on account of her many divisions. The very head has often been divided against itself. There have been Popes and Anti-popes; and in one age there were three living and reigning at one time, presiding over "Catholic unity;" and at the same time cursing, excommunicating, and actually levying war against one another. One schism of this sort lasted no less than fifty years. The rival Popes each created cardinals, and performed all the other functions, which, according to the doctrine of their own church, could be done by only one man,—the successor of St Peter. One of these Popes must necessarily have been a usurper, and every spiritual function conferred by him must have been null and void. All the bishops and priests consecrated and ordained by his authority were mere laymen; and all that they and their successors have ordained down to the present day are no more; for Dr Milner himself will allow that no man can canonically and validly communicate spiritual faculties which he has not himself canonically received from the real head of the church. Now, it has never yet been ascertained which of the rival Popes under each schism was the genuine vicar of Christ; and therefore no priest living can be sure that his faculties are good, and lawfully come by. It is ten to one, that Pius VII. himself is come of some false line; and if so, all the Popish clergy in the world are reduced to the rank of mere laymen. I defy any one of them to prove that his ordination is legitimate. I hold it therefore demonstrated, that by the schism of her rival Popes, according to her own doctrine, the Church of Rome was guilty of suicide. Since that event she has been only the ghost of a united church; and it requires no ordinary portion of impudence in such men as Bossuet and Dr Milner to accuse Protestants of divisions and variations, when their own church, still boasting of infallibility, is riven from head to foot, exhibiting nothing but a confused chaos of rude materials, none of which can be proved ever to have been connected with an undoubted successor of saint Peter.

No. CXCVI.

SATURDAY, APRIL 13TH, 1822.

DR MILNER'S second mark of the true church is sanctity or holiness. The only dispute I have with him on this point is, that, instead of the second, I would call it the first and the last, and the only decisive mark of a true church. He cites the words of Paul to the Ephesians in support of his proposition; and I cite the same words in support of mine:—"Christ loved the church, and gave himself for it; that he might sanctify and cleanse it, with the washing of water by the word; that he might present it to himself, a glorious church, not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish," chap. v. verses 25—27. If Dr Milner could show that this is descriptive of the Church of Rome, the controversy would be at an end; and it would be the duty of all men to join themselves to her. But he does not so much as attempt to show that she is the church here described. He takes it for granted, indeed; and does not seem to think it requires any proof. He never knew or heard of any other true church. He has had his mind preoccupied from infancy with only one idea of the word, "church;" that is, of a worldly, visible society, owning spiritual subjection to his lord, the Pope of Rome. Higher than this his mind cannot rise; beyond this it cannot expand; and it is just as impervious to spiritual illumination on the subject, as the eyeballs of the blind are to the light of the sun. I have heard of a blind man who said he understood the colour of scarlet to be like the sound of a trumpet. If this had got possession of his mind, it would be impossible for all the colour makers and opticians in the world to convey to him a more correct idea of scarlet colour; so he whose mind is preoccupied by the Popish notion of the church, cannot comprehend what is meant by the apostle in the passage above quoted.

This church consists of all the redeemed from among men, of every kindred, nation, and language;—of all who have died in the faith of Christ, who are described as the spirits of just men made perfect; and of all who are now living in the same faith, and are followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises. This church is holy;—the former branch of it perfectly so;—the latter only in part,—but following on towards perfection. This heavenly united society has a representation, but a very imperfect one, in a visible Christian church in which God's word is preached and believed, and his commandments obeyed; and wherever I find such a society, I call it a church of Christ, not THE church, for the definite article has nothing to do in this connection, except as distinguishing between a church in one place, and one in another place, —as the church in Jerusalem, the church in Antioch, &c.

Every such church is, or ought to be, holy; not merely as respects the belief of sound doctrine, though I hold this to be indispensable; but also in the religious and moral character of its members. This I take to be the only decisive mark of a true church;—that its members be holy men; that is, men who, believing the gospel, are taught under its influence, to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, and righteously, and godly, in the present world. Without this, a church may have a creed as orthodox as the twelve apostles could make it, and yet be no better than a synagogue of Satan. What is true of individuals, is also true of communities: —"If any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his;" from which the inference is unavoidable, that a church composed of men who have not the Spirit of Christ, cannot be a church of his; and this, as I shall show by and by, cuts off the Church of Rome from all pretension to be a church; much more from being the only church of Christ.

Churches in old times were addressed as saints and faithful in Christ Jesus; and that this was not the language of compliment, but really descriptive of their character, is certain from its being written by inspiration of the Holy Ghost. These churches were composed of men and women who had been unbelieving Jews or idolatrous heathens, and addicted to many wicked practices; but when they received the gospel, they forsook their sins, and became holy persons, that is, saints. Paul addressing the Christians in Corinth, gives a description of very great sinners; and adds, "Such were some of you; but ye are washed, but ye are sanctified, but ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God," 1 Cor. vi. 9—11. The best of them were but imperfectly sanctified, for perfection in this sense is reserved for the next world, and one at least turned out so very wicked, that they were commanded to put him away; but upon the whole their prevailing character was that of "sanctified in Christ Jesus, and called to be saints," 1 Cor. i. 2. And surely no man will deny that churches ought to be so still. It is only in so far as they are so, that they are obedient to the will of God, and so far as they are otherwise, they approach towards Antichrist.

It was a very wicked fancy that began early to prevail, that the word "saint" applied only to great and distinguished individuals in the churches, such as apostles and evangelists. This idea soon became universal, and all the churches experienced the evil influence of it; for it was no longer reckoned necessary that all the members of churches should be holy men, or give credible evidence of being such. Multitudes were received into fellowship who had not abandoned their heathen principles or wicked practices. Then it became necessary to accommodate both the worship and the language of Christians to the taste of such persons, and unnecessary that all Christians should be holy men; it was enough that they had a saint or two in a century, such as saint Cyprian, saint Jerome, and saint Augustin; and it is a fact, that Dr Milner does not so much as attempt to prove the holiness of the Church of Rome from the character of its members as a body; but only from her having such saints as the above to boast of, along with her holy creeds, and her holy sacraments.

This is the sum total of the sanctity that the "holy Catholic Church" pretends to. In her vocabulary such words as these have no meaning;—"Without holiness," that is, without being a saint, "NO MAN shall see the Lord." And this also condemns the impiety of those nominal Protestants with whom the word saint is a term of reproach.

But it is time to attend to Dr Milner's own statement:

"The comparison," says he, "which I am going to institute between the Catholic Church and the leading Protestant societies in the article of sanctity or holiness, will be made on these four heads: first, the doctrine of holiness; secondly, the means of holiness; thirdly, the fruits of holiness; and lastly, the divine testimony of holiness." Then he proceeds as follows, to show how unholy Protestant churches are in respect of doctrine; and I am sure no Protestant church in the world will recognize its own faith in the representation. "To consider, first, the doctrine of the chief Protestant communions: this is well known to have been originally grounded in the pernicious and impious principles, that God is the author and necessitating cause, as well as the everlasting punisher, of sin;—that man has no free will to avoid sin; and that justification and salvation are the effects of an enthusiastic persuasion under the name of faith, that the person is actually justified and saved without any real belief in the revealed truths; without hope, charity, repentance for sin, benevolence to our fellow-creatures, loyalty to our king and country, or any other virtues; all which were censured by the first Reformers, as they are by the strict Methodists still, under the name of works, and by many of them declared to be even hurtful to salvation." Letter XIX.

The reader will probably pause here with astonishment, and inquire within himself, what sort of monsters are these which he is reading about? and, looking back to the beginning of the extract, he will find that they are "the chief Protestant communions;" namely, the churches of England and Scotland, the Lutherans of Germany, and the Calvinists of France and Geneva; and he will find himself constrained to exclaim, that such a piece of barefaced literary villany was never imposed upon the world. Dr Milner himself is not such a dolt as not to know that the above representation is false throughout, and therefore though he could prove that all the rest of his church were as holy as the virgin Mary, the leaven of his wilful misrepresentation and falsehood would contaminate the whole mass, unless he were immediately excommunicated. Truly that must be a holy church that requires for her defence such wicked and abominable artifice!

The means which he has taken to establish the truth of his shocking accusation, are no less absurd and impudent than the accusation itself. The charge is laid against the chief Protestant communions, or churches. Does he then go to the Confessions, Articles, and public Formularies of these communions to show what they really professed to believe? No such thing. I have gone over all his quotations and references, to the number of about thirty, and there is not the least allusion to the Confession of any Reformed church except one general reference to some of the articles of the Church of England; but he takes care not to give the words, lest the reader should see that they do not bear him out in his charges, and thus detect the imposition. He satisfies himself with detached and distorted scraps, or parts of sentences, from the writings of individuals, such as Luther and Calvin, for which no church is responsible; and which therefore it is not worth while to analyze. It was the misfortune of Luther that he began to write books before his own mind was much enlightened upon some abstruse points; and it is no wonder that in such circumstances he often expressed himself foolishly and rashly. Yet I have no doubt, if the shreds of sentences which Dr Milner has quoted with so much triumph, were restored to their places in the original works and read in their connection, much of that which is revolting in them would disappear.

Calvin wrote with more consideration and precision than Luther; and though I am no more interested in defending him than the other, I shall show by one instance how he is abused by a garbled quotation. "Calvin says," says Dr Milner, "Calvin says, 'God requires nothing of us but faith; he asks nothing of us but that we believe,' Calv. in Joan. vi. Rom. i. Gal. ii." I have not Calvin's works at hand, and though I had, I would not think it worth while to turn to the passages; for I am very sure that he must be speaking of justification; and that in order to this, God requires nothing but faith, which is the bible doctrine, let Papists say what they will. But Dr Milner, by giving these words detached from their connection, wishes his readers to understand, that Calvin teaches, that God requires no other obedience whatever but believing, which I am persuaded this reformer never taught, though I do not profess to be intimately acquainted with his ponderous and multifarious writings.

Dr Milner's object in these mutilated extracts from Luther, Calvin, and others, is to make it appear, that they were enemies of good works, and wrote against them; and thence he infers the unholy character of the Protestant religion. If these writers had been enemies of good works, their error would not have attached to churches or individuals, who never professed to believe in them, and who never wished to be called by their names.

But in point of fact, both Luther and Calvin maintained the necessity of good works, more strongly than any Papist can do upon his principles; and of this Dr Milner himself furnishes abundant evidence, by quoting the words of these reformers, in which they deplore in the most feeling manner the sins which they knew to be practised by many who professed to be reformed from Popery; which does not indicate that they were lovers of sin and enemies of righteousness. The fact is, neither Luther, nor Calvin, nor any other author whom Protestants acknowledge, will be found to write against good works, except as entering into the ground or meritorious cause of our justification. In this view it is admitted, that all works but the work of Christ, are condemned by consistent Protestants; and they were also condemned by Christ's own ambassadors, when they declared, that, by the works of the law no flesh could be justified. There were never more strenuous advocates for the necessity of good works than they were; but they would not put them in the place of the Saviour. It was the same with Luther, and Calvin, and other reformers; and this is the head and front of their offence. They knocked on the head, and exposed to the scorn of the world, the Popish doctrine of the merit of works; and under the shame of this exposure, the Church of Rome has no resource but to make them appear the enemies of good works; just as the Pharisees of old could find nothing against Christ, but by inferring from the fact of his being the friend of publicans and sinners, that he must have been a sinner.

Dr Milner is charitable enough to admit, that modern Protestants have in general abandoned the impious doctrines taught by the Reformers; and that a "tacit reformation," like that in Geneva, has taken place in most or all of the Protestant churches. Then he should withdraw his accusation of the unholiness of their doctrines. But instead of this, he will have it to be unholy still. He will have us to be believers in an unholy creed, though he represents us all as Socinians, who are as far removed as himself from what he calls the impious doctrine of justification by faith. "After all," says he, "the first and most sacred branch of holy doctrine consists in those articles which God has been pleased to reveal concerning his own divine nature and operations, namely, the articles of the unity and trinity of the Deity, and of the incarnation, death, and atonement of the consubstantial Son of God. It is admitted that these mysteries have been abandoned by the Protestants of Geneva, Holland, and Germany. With respect to Scotland, a well informed writer says,—'It is certain that Scotland, like Geneva, has run from high Calvinism, to almost as high Arianism or Socinianism; the exceptions, especially in the cities, are few.' It will be gathered from many passages, which I have cited in my former letters, how widely extended, throughout the established church, is that tacit reform, which a learned professor of its theology signifies to be the same thing with Socinianism. A judgment may also be formed of the prevalence of this system, by the Act of July twenty-first, 1813, exempting the professors of it from the penalties to which they were before subject." Letter XIX. p. 42.

Though not directly bearing upon the present subject, I remark in passing, that the repeal of the act that made it a crime against the state to deny the doctrine of the Trinity, is understood by Dr Milner as indicating a general leaning towards Socinianism, which consists in the denial of that doctrine, and such other doctrines as are dependent upon it. The inference is very absurd as well as untrue; for seeing the Socinians, with all their errors and absurdities, do not own subjection of any kind to a foreign power, the most orthodox statesman could consent to the repeal of a statute against them, without compromising his own religious principles, or endangering the peace of the country. But it is of importance here to notice in what light Papists view things, especially such a distinguished pillar of the Romish church as Dr Milner doubtless is. It seems the repeal of the statute against the Socinians, indicates a general tendency of the people towards Socinianism. Then it follows, that the late repeal of the penal statutes against Popery indicates a tendency towards Popery; and if the statutes which remain, and which exclude Papists from political power, shall be repealed, then it will prove, not merely a tendency, but that the nation is very far gone towards Popery. I leave the advocates of "Catholic Emancipation" to make the best of this disclosure. When "Emancipation" shall be conceded, it will be considered by Papists as a proof that the nation has become Popish; for they feel within themselves that they would not make such a concession upon any other principle than conversion, or a prospect of conversion to the faith of Rome; and therefore, they can have no idea of concession being made to them, but upon the supposition that we are about to adopt their religion. When this shall take place, how much will their zeal for making proselytes be increased! They will then go into every cabin and cottage, and tell the poor people, that the king and parliament are about to avow their conversion to Popery; and this information, connected with what will then be the notorious fact, that Papists are going into parliament and other places of power, will make more converts than either the arts or the eloquence of the priests could ever make.

What Dr Milner has quoted from a "well informed writer," whose name however he conceals, respecting the Socinianism of the Church of Scotland, reminds me of the assertion of a late French traveller, who passed through this country,—who has made a book of his travels, and who gravely tells his readers, that in Scotland the ladies generally go without stockings and shoes. Every man who trusts his own eyes knows it to be an impudent falsehood; but it is not more impudent than the assertion of Dr Milner's "well informed" writer, that our clergy or even our people have run into Socinianism, and that the "exceptions, especially in the cities, are few." I believe there is no country in what is called Christendom more free of this leaven than Scotland is. Within my own recollection there have been only two ministers of the Church of Scotland who publicly avowed Socinian sentiments. One of them, on the remonstrances of his brethren, and perhaps in order to retain his living, made a public recantation, such as it was. The other, being less notorious, and being understood to be in a state of dotage, was not called upon to recant, though he outlived his younger colleague many years. With him died the Socinianism of the Church of Scotland, so far as appears from the acknowledged writings of any of its ministers; and but for the inroads of two or three zealots, chiefly from England, who call themselves rational dissenters, the name would scarcely have been remembered in this part of the world. For any thing I know, there may be individuals, and even ministers in the Church of Scotland, who privately hold Socinian sentiments, and who even preach them in a covert way, where there is no danger of detection; but I am persuaded the proportion of such among our respectable ministers will not be found greater than the proportion of our ladies who do not wear shoes and stockings. The people of Scotland with shame must admit the fact, that elegant young females, with all the signs of ladyship that dress can give, from the head to the ancles, are sometimes seen upon our public roads walking "barefoot." They are not ladies, however, in the received meaning of the term; and would not, with their nudity of understandings, be received into the company of ladies. No more would an avowed Socinian, if such were to appear among us, be acknowledged a true minister of the Church of Scotland, or hailed as a brother by truly respectable sons.

Amidst the charges which Dr Milner brings against Protestants on account of unholy doctrine, he does not, so far as I recollect, accuse the Reformers of being more wicked in their own conduct than their neighbours were. Most Popish writers have done so; and all such have been detected in falsehood. Dr Milner, no doubt aware of this, forbears direct assertion, and has recourse to sly insinuation. Thus, when speaking of Luther and his friends, he usually throws in a qualifying expression, calculated to make them appear gay men of the world; that is, good livers, not in the Christian, but in the libertine sense of the words. "Luther and his bottle companion Amsdorf," are favourite expressions of his; but he has not adduced a particle of evidence, or stated a single circumstance by which it appears that these persons were given to excess in any respect whatever. He refers indeed to another work of his, in which, he says, he has described the wicked lives of the Reformers. But this work I have not seen; and if I had, I suppose I would find no more in it than what the Catholic Vindicator and Amicus Veritatis have written, the falsehood of which I have already exposed.

No. CXCVII.

SATURDAY, APRIL 20TH, 1822.

DR MILNER, having occupied a number of pages in describing the unholiness of the Protestant doctrine, comes at last to describe the holiness of the doctrine of his church; which he does as follows:—"If this was once holy, namely, in the apostolic age, it is holy still; because the church never changes her doctrine, nor suffers any person in her communion to change it, or to question any part of it. Hence the adorable mysteries of the Trinity, the Incarnation, &c. taught by Christ and his apostles, and defined by the four first general councils, are now as firmly believed by every real Catholic, throughout her whole communion, as they were when those councils were held. Concerning the article of man's justification, so far from holding the impious and absurd doctrines imputed to her by her unnatural children, (who sought for a pretext to desert from her) she rejects, she condemns she anathematizes them! It is then false, and notoriously false, that Catholics believe, or in any age did believe, that they could justify themselves by their own proper merits;—or that they can do the least good, in the order of salvation, without the grace of God, merited for them by Jesus Christ; or that we can deserve this grace, by any thing we have the power of doing;—or that leave to commit sin, or even the pardon of any sin, which has been committed, can be purchased by any person whomsoever;—or that the essence of religion and our hopes of salvation consist in forms and ceremonies, or in any other exterior things." Letter XIX. p. 43.

The above is Dr Milner's exposition of the doctrine of the Church of Rome, as opposed to that of Protestant churches. She holds, it seems, "the adorable mysteries of the Trinity, the Incarnation, et cetera;" and he wishes his readers to understand that Protestants do not hold these mysteries; for no other reason can be given why he presents them by way of contrast with the Protestant doctrine. This is another instance of barefaced imposition, as he knows very well. On the subject of justification he labours hard to express himself as much in the style of Protestants as he possibly can, in order to make it appear that Papists do not trust in their own merits; and to make the difference between his doctrine and that of Protestants, upon a fundamental point, appear very trifling. But the idiom of Ashdod is distinctly perceived in his feeble attempt to speak the language of Canaan. He seems as if he would renounce the error of justification by works; but his mode of expression is so perplexed and equivocal, that it may convey to the mind of a Papist the very thing which he professes to renounce; indeed, he himself must understand the words in a sense which admits of justification by works, else he runs into what he calls the pernicious and impious error of justification by faith, or justification by some other medium which he does not name. I take it for granted, however, that there are only two methods by which men expect to be justified; namely, faith and works. The former was maintained by Luther and Calvin, and all the reformed churches; and it is condemned by Dr Milner as a most impious doctrine, and hostile to all good works. Then he must hold the other doctrine, that justification or salvation is, in some sense, by works, or by men's own merits, which is the doctrine of the Church of Rome; and his attempt to deny it by a few equivocal expressions, is only another instance of Jesuitical trickery, intended to deceive the simple.

After all their abuse of the Protestant doctrine, we sometimes find Popish writers labouring to make it appear that there is no great difference between their faith and ours. This is the case with Dr Milner. He states as Protestant doctrines certain absurdities which he knows we do not believe; and having, as he thinks, refuted these, he gives what he takes to be Protestant doctrine as correctly as he can express it; and then he tells us that this is the doctrine of the Church of Rome, and that she condemns and anathematizes the contrary. This is indeed one of the arts by means of which Popish priests are continually endeavouring to make proselytes; and those who are ignorant of all religion, are easily imposed upon by a few equivocal expressions, to believe that the Protestant and Popish belief are nearly, if not precisely, the same. I do not know a better answer to such a misrepresentation, than that which was made by a French peasant, a late convert from Popery, in consequence of his reading the scriptures, as related by a French gentleman at a public meeting here. "Why did you change your religion?" said a Papist to the young convert, "there is no great difference between the Catholic and the Protestant." "Only this difference," said the other, "you worship the God that the priest makes,—we worship the God that made the priest."

Dr Milner however shows, that he cannot state either the Protestant faith or his own, without grossly blundering. He speaks of the grace of God as merited for us by Jesus Christ, which is a great and fundamental error, as I suppose the more intelligent divines of his own church, if there be any more intelligent among them, will condemn as well as any Protestant. To say that the grace of God was merited for us even by Jesus Christ, is to be guilty of the impiety of denying that God is in himself gracious. It is to represent God the Father as all austerity and rigour, and requiring the interposition of the Son to move him to grace and compassion. Now we know from scripture, that the Father is in himself infinitely gracious and merciful. He needed no intercession to make him so; but because he was full of mercy, He provided a Saviour for us. It was He who said, "Deliver from going down to the pit, for I have found a ransom." "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." Christ's work of obedience and suffering is called the work which the Father gave him to do: and the apostles teach us to ascribe our salvation to the free unmerited love of God the Father;—"Herein is love; not that we loved God; but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins," 1 John iv. 10. Christ therefore did not procure, or in any sense merit the grace of God for us; but by his atoning sacrifice of himself he removed that which stood in the way of its exercise. Holiness and justice are as essential attributes of Deity as mercy. These required the punishment of sin. Christ voluntarily took this upon himself; and by suffering the penalty of transgression in his own person, he made it consistent with the righteousness of God to pardon sin; that is, to exercise mercy in the salvation of the guilty. Hence he is both just, and at the same time, the justifier of the ungodly who believe in the name of Christ.

This is the Protestant doctrine; and as it vindicates the holiness of God, and magnifies his law, it is also holy in its tendency: not considered merely as a part of an orthodox creed; for in this sense it may be held without producing any holiness of conduct; but as it is received as a living, divine principle of holiness, implanted by the Holy Spirit in the heart of them that believe in Christ. But Dr Milner speaks of the holy doctrines of his church as persons speak of articles of dress, the fashion of which does not change. If her doctrine "was once holy," "it is holy still; because the church never changes her doctrine, nor suffers any persons in her communion to change it, or to question any part of it." This may be true enough, while yet it signifies nothing; seeing it relates merely to what the church has in her creed; but not written in the hearts of her members; and which even in her creed is rendered inoperative by its association with error.

I need not follow Dr Milner through his long-winded description of the means of sanctity, which are, of course, his seven sacraments, and the public service of his church, including the sacrifice of the mass, because I have under the different heads of Penance, Transubstantiation, Extreme Unction, &c. exposed the absurdity and impiety of most of these things. I pass on therefore, to what he calls the fruits of sanctity which have been produced in the Church of Rome.

These, as I said in my last Number, are certain individuals, called saints, about the average of two or three in a century, whom he names,—such as St Dunstan, St Augustin of Canterbury, St Chad, St Swithin, St Dominic, St Bonaventure, &c.; and because the Church of Rome produced such men, she is the holy, and must be the only true church! He gives indeed a general view of her holiness in the following terms:—"It is certain that the supernatural virtues, and heroical sanctity of a countless number of holy personages of different countries, ranks, professions, and sexes, have illustrated the Catholic Church in every age, with an effulgence which cannot be disputed or withstood." Part II. p. 63. St Dominic, for instance, he should have told us, illustrated the church by the effulgence of the flames which he kindled for burning heretics to death, and by establishing the holy Inquisition in order to keep the flame continually alive.

But to come nearer home, Dr Milner challanges the following comparison between the saints of his church and the sinners of the Reformation, not doubting that the holiness will be found on the side of the saints, as doubtless it ought to be. "Let them, from the very accounts of Protestant historians, compare, as to religion and morality, Archbishop Cranmer with his rival, Bishop Fisher; Protector Seymour with Chancellor More; Ann Bulleyn with Catherine of Arragon; Martin Luther and Calvin with Francis Xavierius and Cardinal Pole; Beza with St Francis Sales; Queen Elizabeth with Mary Queen of Scots: these contrasted characters having more or less relation with each other. From such a comparison I have no sort of doubt, what the decision of your friends will be concerning them in point of their respective holiness." P. 64. It is difficult to believe a man not in jest, who institutes a comparison between the two queens last mentioned, on the point of holiness of character, especially when he means to maintain that Mary was the holiest of the two. But he is perfectly in earnest; though one can scarcely help thinking that he attaches a meaning of his own to the word holiness; or perhaps he proceeds upon the principle, avowed in private, by the flatterers of public men, who ascribe all the virtues most profusely to those whom they know to be most destitute, and who therefore have most need of them.

I have no doubt, that upon Dr Milner's own data, it could easily be shown, that the advantage, in point of holiness, is on the side of the Protestants whom he is pleased to contrast with the great men of Rome, at least among those who professed to be religious Protestants, such as Luther, Calvin, and Beza; and as for the Protestant Queen and Protector, on the one hand, and the Popish Queen and Chancellor, on the other, it is of no importance to which of them we ascribe most of that which none of them possessed. But it must be a miserable church that can produce no better evidence of its holiness than two or three individuals in an age, and even these not better than the average of mere men of the world. An inspired apostle condemns such comparisons of men among themselves; and therefore I shall let this alone. I shall not even attempt to prove that Protestant churches are holier than that of Rome, for we have nothing to boast of; but seeing the Church of Rome is incessantly boasting of her holiness, I shall endeavour to humble her a little for her own benefit.

At the time of the Reformation, and for ages before, the corruption of manners in the Church of Rome was so great and so universal, that any man who possessed the least regard for decency of character was quite shocked by it. The writers of those days have left on record the most ample testimony to this effect; not writers of the Reformation only,—but also men of great note who lived and died in the Church of Rome, have left their testimony against her monstrous and abominable wickedness. I could fill volumes with extracts on this subject, from the writings of men high in rank and office in the church, which would overwhelm our modern Papists with confusion, if they were not hardened beyond all feeling of shame. If it be asked, why I bring the guilt of past ages to the view of the present age, as if I meant to make the children responsible for the deeds of their fathers? I answer, because they maintain that their church never was at any time otherwise than a holy church; and because if it be admitted that she does not now present features of such horrible wickedness and bloody cruelty, it is because the light of the Reformation has shamed her out of much which she formerly practised without a blush: and I might add, because her character at the period of the Reformation was such as to justify every honest man in separating from a body, with which he could not continue united without being polluted, and hazarding the salvation of his soul.

Some time before the Reformation the Cardinal of Cambray wrote as follows:—"That although they are great evils which we see, yet unless the church be speedily reformed, we shall in a short time see unspeakably greater; after those horrible thunders we have already heard, we shall presently hear others that are more horrible." After reciting the complaints of St Bernard of the corrupt state of the church in his time, the Cardinal proceeds:—"If these things were spoken by blessed Bernard, they may now much more be said; because since his time the church hath proceeded from bad to worse; and in the whole state, as well spiritual as secular, virtue being abandoned, it hath fallen into the shame and filthiness of vice." For this and the other quotations which follow, in this Number, I am indebted to the first discourse in the Preservative against Popery, entitled "The Reformation Vindicated on account of the necessity of it," in which the most particular references are given, and usually the very words of the original Latin in the margin.

Nicholas de Clemangis writes:—"That wicked persons did so much abound in all professions of men, that scarce one among a thousand was to be found, who did sincerely live answerably to their professions; and if there was any one who was honest, chaste, and frugal, and did not follow this lewd kind of life, he was made a laughing stock to others, and was presently called either an insolent and singular madman, or else a hypocrite." The Cardinal of Lorrain, in the Council of Trent, in a speech on the subject, attributes all the calamities which had befallen France to the gross and general corruption of manners.

But Dr Milner will excuse himself, and justify his church, by telling the world, that these descriptions refer to laymen only; and that the Church of Rome never professed to make them too holy in this world, for then there would have been no need of priestly absolution, or purgatorial fire; and there would have been no more use for priests than there was for hangmen in the days of King Alfred. Let us see then how it was with the priests themselves,—those holy men who could save the most unholy by means of holy oil, and a few Latin words. Cardinal Julien, in his epistle to Pope Eugenius IV. tells him:—"That the people were above measure incensed against the ecclesiastical state, by the dissolute lives of the clergy, for which," says he, "it is greatly to be feared, unless they mend their manners, lest the laymen, after the example of the Hussites, fall foul upon the whole clergy. And in truth, this deformity administers great boldness to the Bohemians, and gives a fair colour to their errors, who especially inveigh against the filthiness of the clergy." The Suffragan Bishop of Saltzburg, in the words of Catherine of Sienna, gives the following character of the common clergy, at the beginning of the Reformation:—"The modern and unhappy clergy addict themselves to temporal things, being destitute of divine light; they love themselves, neglect the love of God and their neighbour; they are worse than worldly men, whom they destroy together with themselves. They are addicted to pleasures and infamous practices, and neglect the salvation of the souls of Christ's faithful people. By the lives of such wicked clergymen, the seculars come to be disobedient and irreverent towards the church; they are seduced by blind guides, who, O shame! are ignorant idiots, proud, covetous, hypocrites, simoniacal, luxurious, envious, slow to good works, prone to evil, &c. Where at this day can be found that continence in gesture, diet, apparel, and laughter, that becomes the clergy? At banquets, taverns, plays, and theatres, they are more frequently found, than in places dedicated to God. How hugely pernicious to the universal church, the scurrility, ignorance, fornication, simony, and other crimes are, with which almost the whole clergy is infected, there is no man doubts." And Nicholas de Clemangis, who was himself an archdeacon in the Church of Rome, represents her clergy as the dregs and scum of mankind, as persons who abandoned themselves to the most loathsome vices. My author gives the passage without a translation, thinking it, I suppose, too bad to be expressed in modern English. I shall give only the concluding sentence:—"Crapulati vero et inebriati pugnant, clamant, tumultuantur, nomen Dei et sanctorum suorum pollutissimis labiis execrantur, sicque tandem compositi ex meretricum suarum amplexibus, ad Divinum altare veniunt."

Let us ascend the scale of ecclesiastical rank, and see if we find the state of moral any better; and I request the reader to remember that I am not citing the authority of lying Protestants;—I am quoting the very words of great authors of the Church of Rome, who surely would not represent their holy mother in a light more depraved than she really was. "The bishops," says the above-mentioned Bishop of Saltzburg, "serve their own tables instead of the altar; they are unwise in divine things, while they love the wisdom of the world; they are more employed in the offices of the exchequer than in the work of Christ; they adorn their bodies with gold, they defile their souls with impurity; they account it a shame to employ themselves in spiritual matters, and their glory is to meddle with those things that are scurrilous. Hence it is said by Catharine of Sienna—they, as men that are blinded, reckon that to be their honour, that is truly their shame; contrary to the canons, they keep about themselves, pimps, bawds, flatterers, and buffoons; such as give themselves wholly to vanity, instead of men that are learned and of good report."—"The bishops neglect due hospitality, by neglecting the poor of Christ, by making themselves fat, by feeding dogs and other beasts, and so one beast feeds another, as if they chose to be of the number of those, against whom the Lord will pronounce that just sentence,—I was poor and ye received me not, therefore depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire. There are few bishops who are not covetous, they take by violence other men's goods, and wastefully spend the goods of the church; they bestow the revenues of the church not to pious uses, but upon their kindred, upon stageplayers, flatterers, huntsmen, whores, and such like persons; they rather make provision for the wickedness of men, than for the necessities of nature."

This was a complaint against the bishops by one of their own body, who must have known them well, in the year 1519, when the Reformation by Luther had just begun; and, supposing the representation to be exaggerated tenfold, it exhibits enough to justify Luther and all the others who abandoned the communion of a church so immersed in vice and abominable filthiness, that it was scarcely possible to avoid pollution, or to have any communion with it but a fellowship in iniquity. That matters were little better forty years after, appears by the speech of the Duke of Bavaria's ambassador to the Council of Trent; in which he tells the Council, that the cause of the evils that were risen among them, was the bad life of the clergy, whose wickedness was so great, that he could not relate it, without offending the chaste ears of his auditory.

The cardinals were still worse than the bishops. "If any man would make an image of pride," says Clemangis, "he can no way do it more to the life, than by representing a cardinal to the eyes of the beholders." "The whole world complained of the pride and luxury of the cardinals." And can any man think there was not just cause for this complaint, who will but consider what vast revenues were spent upon their lusts? "For not two, or three, or ten, or twenty, benefices would suffice; but a hundred or two hundred; yea, sometimes four, or five hundred, or more, were usurped by one cardinal; and those not of the poorer sort, but the fattest and richest of all. And well had it been for the inferior clergy, had they been content with that prodigious number, but the great mischief was, that nothing could satisfy them; but how great soever they had, they still more vehemently coveted more."

I should now ascend to the Pope, and describe the holiness of him who impiously assumes to be HOLINESS itself; but as it would not be consistent with due reverence, to thrust the "head of Catholic unity" into the tail of one of my schismatical PROTESTANTS, I must let "His Holiness" wait till next week.

No. CXCVIII.

SATURDAY, APRIL 27TH, 1822.

DR MILNER asserts that the Church of Rome is distinguished by the "Fruits of holiness;" that is, by the number of holy persons which she has produced; and therefore, he concludes that she is the only true church. Though we were to grant his premises, the conclusion does not necessarily follow; for though he could prove that she produced ever so many millions of saints in former ages, if she be not producing saints at present, she is not a true, but an apostate church. There were, no doubt, many holy persons at one time in the seven churches in Asia; but when these churches embraced error in doctrine, and suffered immorality in practice among their members, the apostle John was divinely instructed to warn them that unless they repented they would be cast off. When this judgment came upon them, they were no longer true churches. They might continue to exist for ages under the name of Christian; but when Christ had removed his candlestick, and withdrawn his Spirit from them, they were no better than the dead skeleton of a once living body. That this is the present state of the Church of Rome may be inferred from her own account of herself. She does not know, at least cannot be certain, that she has a single saint at this day in her communion; for no man or woman can be admitted into the rank of saints till a hundred years after death; * and it will depend upon the Pope of a distant period, whether any of the present day shall be canonized, that is, put among the saints. This law, by which the saint-fication of her members is delayed for a hundred years, is one of the wisest and most modest things the Church of Rome ever did; for she knows very well that if she were to call the average, or even the best of her members, saints while alive, the world would laugh at both her and them.

But the reader must be aware that I am taking a too favourable view of the Church of Rome, when I speak only of her present state, and as if I admitted her holiness up to a late period; for she has been notoriously unholy for many hundred years. She is not the mere skeleton of a once living body,—she is not like a collection of dry inoffensive bones; she is a putrid carcase, presenting to the moral sense all that is loathsome and abominable. This I established in my last Number, by the testimony of her own authors, who wrote previous to, and about the period of, the Reformation, who tell us plainly that all ranks and degrees among them were corrupt beyond expression, especially the clergy, from the lowest curate up to the greatest cardinal. It remains now that I show what sort of men the Popes were; and as these claimed to be the head and centre of all power, spiritual and temporal, they had usually concentrated in their own persons all the vices of the inferior members.

* I am not sure but there may be some alteration in this respect since the restoration of the Pope, after his late humiliation.

Papists have a saying among themselves, that Gregory the Great was the last of the good, and the first of the bad Popes; by which they acknowledge that they have not had a good Pope for twelve hundred years, which, I suppose, is the truth. We need not look back to the dark ages, in which their own historians tell us, they were "monsters and prodigies;" (Hæc monstra, hæc portenta. Plat. in Vita Benedicti IV.) "and so void of piety, as neither to regard the person they sustained, nor the place they were in." (Sabellic. Ennead. 9. l. i.) Let us rather see what was their character about the time of the Reformation, when it might have been expected that a regard for their own interest would have induced them at least to assume the appearance of virtue.

"When after the death of Innocent VIII. Lionel, Bishop of Concordia, in an oration to the cardinals, pressed them with the most rousing arguments, to choose a good man whose life was without scandal; (Raynald, an. 1492.) what was the effect? Alexander VI. was chosen, a man, if he may be so called, who was the reproach of human nature; who, before he was chosen Pope, was a prodigy of lust and other vices, and continued to be so to the last; when, by the just judgment of God, he was poisoned, by a mistake in drinking that cup himself which he had prepared to despatch others." See Preservative against Popery, Tit. I. p. 32. with the authorities.

"Paul III. lived not long enough to let the world know what he would prove, for he died within six and twenty days after his election." Ibid.

"Julius II. who succeeded him, was guilty of crimes so notorious as to be a scandal to the whole church. He filled Italy with rapine, war, and blood; to which he was so addicted, that contrary to the law of nations, he commanded the procurator of the Duke of Savoy to be tortured because he endeavoured to persuade him to peace. So monstrous were his acts, that Richerius says he must be wholly made of steel who can read them without horror." See as before.

"Pope Leo X. in whose time the Reformation began, was a civil, debonnair gentleman; but so little concerned for religion that he cared not to know what it meant. When he admitted discourses of that nature, it was for the sake of diversion, and to make himself sport. His soul, he thought, was no longer lived than his body, and therefore he gave himself up to sensual gratifications; and it was but reason, that he, who supposed he should die like a beast, should live like an epicure." Ibid.

"Clement VII. as he got the Popedom by simony, so he administered it by as ill arts as he got it. His prime virtue was dissimulation. He made no conscience of his word or oath, but broke his covenants as oft as he made them." Ibid.

"Paul III. and Julius III. followed next. The characters given of them by many of the Romish writers are so foul and loathsome, that if I had the face to write them, no modest man would read them without blushing." Ibid.

Such was the monstrous wickedness of the holy church, in the head and all her members, about this time, that the world itself, depraved as it is, could bear it no longer, but cried for deliverance. The court of Rome was beset by complaints and remonstrances by the emperor and other sovereign princes, in which they demanded a correction of those abuses which they and their subjects felt to be intolerable. In short, they called for reformation, which the Pope was extremely unwilling to grant; but which he durst not peremptorily refuse, lest the nations and their princes should reform themselves, as some of them had already done. His holiness promised, and shuffled, and temporised for many years; but at last consented to the calling of a council at Trent, the professed object of which was to satisfy those who were demanding reformation: but which, instead of reforming abuses, rather confirmed them, and established by law many errors, which had been only tacitly admitted before. Before the Pope would consent to call such a council, he tried many expedients to silence the universal clamour that was raised against the corruptions of the church. He once and again made a feint as if he would set seriously about reformation himself; and Paul III. went so far as to appoint four cardinals and five other prelates to draw up a catalogue of grievances and abuses which needed reformation, to make the world believe that he was going to reform. These prelates drew up a paper under the title of "The Advice given to Pope Paul III. by four Cardinals and five other Prelates, whose names are underwritten, in order to the Amendment of the State of the Church." Among the names subscribed to this document, we find Cardinal John Peter Caraffa, afterwards Pope Paul IV. and Reginald Pole, Cardinal of England, men who were not likely to give an exaggerated representation of the evil state of their own church. Of the document itself Dr

Clagget gave a translation, which may be seen in the "Preservative against Popery," Vol. i. Tit. I. It occupies six large folio pages closely printed; and it makes such a disclosure of notorious corruption, and worse than heathen abomination, prevailing through the whole church from the head down to the lowest members, that it is astonishing that any man who has any respect for his own character, should acknowledge his connection with it, and that he should not with indignation renounce the communion and the name of a church which pollutes the very earth more than the cities did, which God destroyed by fire and brimstone from heaven.

The principal abuses which are here brought to the view of "His Holiness" exhibit the greatest degree of wickedness of which human nature is capable; that is, selling and bartering the souls of men for livings to the priests. "Another abuse," say the advisers, "of a most grievous nature, is the collation of ecclesiastical benefices, especially with cure of souls, and above all, of bishopricks; the manner having been, that good provision is made for those having the benefices; but for the flock of Christ and the church, none at all."—"There is another abuse also in the changing of benefices, upon contracts that are all of them simoniacal, in which no regard is had to any thing but gain:"—And so on throughout the whole paper, the Church of Rome stands confessed, the antichrist, that makes merchandise of men's souls; for that which so many of her own dignitaries, including one who was afterwards Pope, have so solemnly declared to be true, may be considered as virtually the admission of the church herself. By this document alone the Reformation is fully vindicated; and I am surprised that it has not been oftener published, and more generally known; for as a defence of the Reformation it renders any other publication unnecessary.

What, for instance, can be a more complete vindication of Henry VIIIth's suppression of monasteries, and John Knox's preaching them down, than the following:—"In the orders of the Religious, there is another abuse to be corrected, that many of them are so degenerate, that they are grown scandalous, and their examples pernicious to the seculars. We think the conventual orders are (i. e. ought) to be abolished, not by doing any man that injury of dispossessing him, but by forbidding them to admit any more. For thus, without wronging any one, they would soon be worn out, and good Religious might be substituted instead of them; but at present it were best, that all children who are not yet professed, should be taken from the monasteries." They did not wish to abolish the Religious or monastic life altogether; but their words plainly imply that the monasteries, as they then were, ought to be suppressed. Again, say these advisers of His Holiness:—"Christian people are disturbed by another abuse, which concerns Nuns that are under the care of conventual Friars; where, in most monasteries, public sacrileges are committed, to the intolerable scandal of the citizens." Here, under the modest expression, sacrilege, the illicit intercourse between the friars and nuns is explicitly admitted, "to the intolerable scandal of the citizens."

I shall quote a few sentences from the conclusion of this official paper, in order to show that the Pope's advisers were perfectly acquainted with the state of morals, as well as of discipline, in their holy church:—"Thus, according to our capacity, having summarily described all those things which belong to the duty of a supreme bishop of the Catholic church, it remains that we say something of that which belongs to the Roman bishop. This city of Rome is both the mother of the church, and the mistress of other churches; wherefore the worship of God and purity of manners should flourish there most of all: But yet, Holy Father, all strangers are scandalized when they go into St Peter's church, and see what slovenly ignorant priests say mass there, so habited and clothed, that they could not appear cleanly in a nasty house. This is so mighty an offence to all, that the most reverend the archpresbyter and the penitentiary are to take care of this thing, and remove the scandal: and the like order is to be taken in other churches.

"Nay, in this city, whores walk about as if they were goodly matrons; or they ride upon mules, and are at noonday followed up and down by men of the best account in the families of cardinals, and by clergymen. We see no such degeneracy in any other city, but in this which is to be an example to all others. These whores live in splendid houses: 'Tis a filthy abuse, and ought to be mended."—

"Now these are the things, most Holy Father, which we for the present have brought together, as our capacity would permit, that as to us it seems needful, they may be corrected. But you, in your goodness and wisdom, will make a more perfect judgment of every thing. We indeed, though we have not answered the greatness of the concern, which is too hard for us, yet at least have satisfied our own consciences, and cannot but conceive great hope, that under your government we may see the Church of God purged, fair as a dove, at harmony with itself, and united into one body, to the never dying honour of your name. You have taken to yourself the name of Paul; we hope you will imitate the charity of Paul, who was a chosen vessel to carry the name of Christ among the Gentiles. We hope that you are chosen to restore the name of Christ, forgotten by the nations, and even by us the clergy, that hereafter it may live in our hearts, and appear in our actions, to heal our diseases, to reduce the flock of Christ to one sheepfold, to remove from us that indignation and vengeance of God, which we deserve, which is now ready to fall upon us, which now hangs over our heads."

It did not occur to these great prelates that they were hurting their own cause when they called the city of Rome the mother of the church; for if they mean Christian Rome, it is making the church her own mother, or admitting that Christianity existed before the Church of Rome, which would be to deny her primacy. If they mean Pagan Rome, they concede to Protestants the heathen origin of their church; and then we need not be surprised to find the daughter so like the mother, or that she has greatly surpassed her in wickedness, as often happens.

The proposed reformation came to nothing. As Dr Clagget says in his preface:—"The trick was to make the Christian princes believe, that he that required, and they who gave this advice, were in good earnest: And so it was sent into Germany, where it produced quite other effects than were hoped for; for all men's mouths were opened against the court (of Rome) more than they were before: And the court soon showed, that this solemn advice was but mere artifice and collusion to amuse the world, and keep off the much-dreaded council as long as it was possible;" and when Cardinal Caraffa came to be Pope, eighteen years after, he showed no disposition to make one step in that reform which he had joined in recommending to his predecessor. All this tended to convince the Reformers, that it was vain to expect the Church of Rome would ever mend her manners; and that they had done right in endeavouring to reform themselves.

I request the reader again to remember, that all my proofs of the unholiness of the boasted and boasting "holy Catholic church," both in the head and the members, are drawn from writers high in authority in that very church. Out of the mouth of her own children she stands condemned; and surely these children knew her well. Protestant writers cannot say a word on this subject but they are accused of misrepresenting and calumniating the "Catholic church." To this incessantly reiterated charge, Dr Sherlock has furnished a sufficient answer, part of which I shall here present to the reader. I quote as I find it prefixed to the Bishop of St David's Protestant Catechism:—

"As to the probability of this charge. (Misrepresenting) Now, 1. Ask them whether the first Reformers charged the Church of Rome with such doctrines and practices as they were not guilty of? We have not, that I know of, increased our charge against the Church of Rome in this age; if there has been any difference, we have rather been more favourable and candid in our censures of some of their doctrines, than the first Reformers were. Now, is it likely that the first Reformers should charge the Church of Rome wrongfully? No man can be a misrepresenter, but either out of ignorance or design: which of these can we, with any probability, charge the Reformers with?

"As for ignorance, is it a probable thing, that Luther, Melancthon, Œcolampadius, Zuinglius, Bucer, Calvin, or, to come to our own English Reformers, that Archbishop Cranmer, and others, who had all been Papists themselves, should be ignorant what was taught and practised in the Church of Rome? It is now thought in this very cause a very considerable proof, that Protestants do misrepresent Papists, because some Papists deny such doctrines and practices as Protestants charge them with; and, say they, can you think that Papists do not understand their own religion better than Protestants do? Now, though this may be made a question, (and I am very apt to think, that, compare the learned and unlearned Protestants and Papists together, there are more Protestants than Papists who understand Popery; and not only experience verifies this, but there is a plain reason why it should be so; because it is the principle of Protestants, that they must neither believe nor disbelieve any thing without understanding it; but an implicit faith in the church governs the unlearned Papists, and many of those who should be learned too; but let that be as it will,) this argument signifies nothing to our first Reformers: for if Papists may be presumed to understand their own religion, the first Reformers, who were all educated in Popery, might be as well presumed to understand what Popery then was; and therefore there can be no reason to suspect that they misrepresented Popery out of ignorance.

"Nor is it more probable that they should misrepresent Popery out of interest and design: for if they were conscious to themselves, that Popery was not so bad as they represent it to be, why should they themselves have set up for Reformers? and what hope could they have, that at that time, when Popery was so well known, they should persuade the world to believe their misrepresntations?

"Was it so desirable a thing for men to bring all the powers of the Church of Rome upon themselves, merely to gratify misrepresenting humour? Do these men remember what our Reformers suffered for opposing Popery? The loss of their estates, their liberties, their lives, all the vengeance of a blind and enraged zeal. And did they undergo all this with such constancy and Christian patience, only for the sake of telling lies, and raising scandalous reports of the Church of Rome? We think it a very good argument, that the apostles and first preachers of Christianity were honest men, and had no design to cheat the world, because they served no worldly interest by it; but cheerfully exposed themselves to all manner of sufferings in preaching the gospel; and why does not the same argument prove our first Reformers to be honest men, and then they could not be wilful misrepresenters?

"Nay, if we will but allow them to have been cunning men, (and it is evident they did not want wit,) they would never have undertaken so hopeless a design, as to run down Popery merely by misrepresenting it; when, had their exceptions against Popery been only misrepresentations of their own, all the world could have confuted them: had the first Reformers been only misrepresenters, can we think that they could have imposed upon such vast numbers of men, learned and unlearned, who knew and saw what Popery was? They were no fools themselves, and therefore could not hope to impose such a cheat upon the world.

"2. Ask them again, how old this complaint is, of Protestants misrepresenting Popery? how long it has been discovered that Popery is thus abused and misrepresented? Were the first Reformers charged with these misrepresentations by their adversaries in those days?" &c., &c.

The learned author proceeds to put a series of interrogatories, to which the only answer, consistent with truth, must be, that the first Reformers were not so accused of misrepresenting. They knew from personal observation and experience the truth of their accusations of the Church of Rome; the Church of Rome herself knew the truth of them, and all the world knew it. The church did not then affect to deny them, or to accuse the Reformers of misrepresenting; she rather admitted, and defended, or at least palliated, what was laid to her charge.

This reasoning is cogent and unanswerable, as a defence of the Reformers against the charge of misrepresenting and calumniating the Church of Rome. But, with regard to the point in hand, we have little use for such arguments; for, as I have said again and again, the monstrous corruptions of this church are admitted, asserted, dilated upon, and deplored by her own authors in language more strong than that which the Reformers used. We might therefore lay aside the writings of the latter altogether, and, by those of the former alone, we can demonstrate that the Church of Rome does not possess those fruits of holiness of which Dr Milner boasts; and that, therefore, she does not possess this mark of the true church.

No. CXCIX.

SATURDAY, MAY 4TH, 1822

I AM now arrived at what Dr Milner calls the "Divine attestation" of the "sanctity" of the Church of Rome. By this we are to understand the miracles which in all ages have been performed by the saints, and which are as illustrious in the present age as they were in that of the apostles. Not that there are any living saints remarkable for miraculous powers, for he does not venture to tell us where so much as one is to be found alive who can do the slightest miracle; but he gives us very pompous descriptions of miraculous cures performed by St Wenefride at her holy well in Wales, within the last twenty years; and one case of an incurable disease having been cured by a touch of the hand of a priest who was hanged in the reign of Charles I. one of whose hands, it seems, is preserved in Lancashire, for the purpose of working miracles; and if we can believe Dr Milner, this dead hand is more powerful than a thousand living ones.

We have a great deal of unnecessary discussion about the miracles performed by Christ and his apostles. I say unnecessary discussion; because Protestants do not call in question the reality of divinely-attested miracles, in either the Old or the New Testament. Dr Milner, however, argues for the reality of the miracles performed by the apostles, apparently for no other purpose than to make it appear that the Church of Rome has the power of working miracles; and, of course, he wishes us to believe that the apostles were clergymen and saints of the Romish Church. I believe some authors have conceded a great deal too much with regard to the miraculous powers alleged to have been possessed by some distinguished Christians after the apostolic age. For my part I am determined to keep by my fundamental principle of the bible alone. I do not say that no miracles were ever performed but what are recorded in the Bible; but I do say, that I do not believe in any which are not recorded there; and I acknowledge no authority that requires me to believe in any other.

Through many tiresome pages, Dr Milner connects a chain of miracles, from the first century down to the Reformation, in which chain, one St Bernard appears a link of great magnitude and lustre. After the Reformation a saint arose who outstripped all who had gone before him. Of this saint Dr Milner thus writes:—

"The miracles of St Francis Xaverius, the apostle of India, who was contemporary with Luther, in number, splendour, and publicity, may vie with St Bernard's. They consisted in foretelling future events, speaking unknown languages, calming tempests at sea, curing various maladies, and raising the dead to life; and though they took place in remote countries, yet they were verified in the same, soon after the saint's death, by virtue of a commission from John III. King of Portugal, and were generally acknowledged, not only by Europeans of different religions in India, but also by the native Mahomedans and Pagans." Letter XXIII. pp. 80, 81.

"It is painful to think," says Mr Grier, "that in the present enlightened age, a gentleman like Dr Milner, who displays learning in almost every department of science; who possesses experience, intelligence, and taste; who writes well and who reasons acutely—should be so besotted, as not only to believe himself, but to attempt to induce others to believe, all the stupid legends of the dark ages, and the modern fabrications of the same stamp. Such fatuity would be a miracle in itself, were it not known how superstition debases the reason, when it has gained the ascendant over the mind." Reply to Dr Milner's End of Controversy, p. 361.

"As to Xavier," says the same writer, "it might have been expected that the doctor would have been more reserved in ascribing miraculous powers to one, who lived so much nearer our own times, than to those of more distant ages; because, the means of detecting imposture is more within our reach, in the former than in the latter case; and because, if he found that recourse had been had to fabrication with respect to accounts of modern date, it sinks into disrepute those of earlier origin.

"Of Xavier's miracles, which, Dr Milner says, 'consisted in foretelling future events, speaking unknown languages, calming tempests at sea, and raising the dead to life,' Acosta, a contemporary writer, a Jesuit, and a missionary also, makes no mention. But had these singular occurrences taken place, he must have noticed them. And, with respect to the gift of tongues, which is ascribed to him in a supernatural degree, it is certain that he himself deeply lamented, in one of his letters, his deficiency in this very particular! Now, where he wanted a requisite which would have been so essential to the cause of proselytism among the Pagans, it is highly improbable that his saintship would have been invested with any other. Indeed, his simple acknowledgment on this one point throws discredit on the other miraculous stories told of him. But Dr Milner adds, that Xavier's miracles 'were verified soon after the saint's death by virtue of a commission from John III. King of Portugal.' Here again the silence of Acosta about those alleged miracles meets him; and not only this, but the express assertion of this writer that no miracles whatever were performed in India. And, as Acosta's account was not published for nearly forty years after Xavier's death, it is evident that that space of time at least elapsed before his miracles were thought of. This is Bishop Douglas' opinion on the subject;* and though Dr Milner attempts to invalidate it by a reference to Acosta's work, yet the very place† referred to establishes its correctness. That writer barely says that 'great signs were reported of Xavier by numerous and credible witnesses. But Dr Milner goes farther, since he says that they not only 'vie in number, splendour, and publicity with the miracles of St Bernard;' but appear to equal those of our Saviour himself!!" Reply, &c. pp. 367—369.

About a year or two ago, I read as much of St Francis Xavier's life and miracles as disgust and contempt would allow me. I shall give one miracle as a sample of the whole. I write from memory, as I am not now in possession of the book:—The holy saint had a consecrated crucifix which he valued above all things in the world. On a sea voyage, one day, he lost it overboard; and was quite inconsolable. After landing at the country whither he went, and walking on the sea shore, he saw his favourite image coming towards him, elevated above the surface of the water. Gazing with astonishment and delight, and going to the water's edge, it was most reverently laid down at his feet, by a crab, who had borne it in its claws through the ocean, to the very spot where the saint was miraculously brought at the time to receive it.

This is gravely related as one of the miracles of St Francis Xavier, the apostle of the Indies. But it appears to me that he had no hand in it whatever; and did not so much as expect any thing of the kind to happen. The crab is entitled to the whole credit of this miracle; and I would have advised the Pope, at his next diet of canonization, to have put this animal among the saints, had he not been anticipated by the heathen Egyptians, or Chaldeans, who gave him a place among the constellations, where, under his Latin name, Cancer, he has the honour of making the extremity of the sun's northern declination.

But the gross wickedness of such a story as the above consists chiefly in the idolatry that

---

* "See CRITERION of Miracles, p. 84. Dr Buchanan tells us of his having observed to the Archbishop of Goa, that 'Xavier was an eminently great man; but that what others have written for him and of him, tarnished his fame by making him the inventor of fables. To which the chief Inquisitor candidly signified his assent.' See Christian Researches, p. 162. This anecdote is the more valuable, both as it records the admission of a Popish ecclesiastic of high rank, resident on the very theatre of Xavier's ministry, and consequently acquainted with every act of his; and as it exhibits the hollow pretensions set up for this saint by Dr Milner, on the score of miraculous agency."

† . . . "'quod miraculorum nulla facultas sit, quæ apostoli plurima perpetrarunt.'—De Procur., &c. l. ii. cap. 8. Here Acosta denies that the missionaries had ANY power; but Dr Milner's gloss is, 'that they only had not the same facility as the apostles.' FACULTAS—facility, secundum Milner! See Letter XXIV."

it implies and cherishes. It is evidently meant to be inculcated that there was a divinity in the holy image which the saint worshipped, that could inspire the crab with the thought of its preservation, and restoration to its devout worshipper: and those who believe the story are confirmed in their idolatrous practices; for that Papists, even those who live among us, do worship such things is beyond all doubt, though they deny, or wish to conceal it. Of this I have the evidence of one of their own communion, who lately called on me, being introduced by a friend, for the purpose of becoming acquainted with one who had made himself so notorious by his opposition to the "Catholic Church." He had read part at least of my work with great care, and had many passages marked, which he wished to converse with me about. I talked fully an hour with him; and showed him several Popish books which he had never seen, and some sentiments in them which surprised him, of which he requested, and obtained, written extracts. Turning over Dr Milner's work, I pointed to the crucifix, or figure of the crucifixion, at the root of his apostolical tree, and asked him to tell me candidly,—"Do you really worship a thing like that?"—"They do it," said he, "but I always feel an aversion to it."

With regard to home, and more recent miracles, Dr Milner thus addresses his correspondents:—"Methinks I hear some of your society thus asking me: 'Do you then pretend that your church possesses the miraculous powers at the present day?' I answer that the church never possessed miraculous powers in the sense of most Protestant writers, so as to be able to effect cures or other supernatural events at her mere pleasure: for even the apostles could not do this; as we learn from the history of the lunatic child, Matt. xvii. 16. But this I say, that the Catholic Church, being always the beloved Spouse of Christ, Rev. xxi. 9. and continuing at all times to bring forth children of heroical sanctity, God fails not in this, any more than in past ages, to illustrate her and them by unquestionable miracles. Accordingly, in those processes which are constantly going on, at the apostolic see, for the canonization of new saints, fresh miracles of a recent date continue to be proved with the highest degree of evidence, as I can testify from having perused, on the spot, the official printed account of some of them. For the further satisfaction of your friends, I will inform them that I had satisfactory proof, that the astonishing catastrophe of Louis XVI. and his Queen, in being beheaded on a scaffold, was foretold by a nun of Fougeres, Sœur Nativité, twenty years before it happened; and that the banishment of the French clergy from their country, long before it happened, was predicted by the holy French pilgrim, Benedict Labre, whose miracles caused the conversion of the late Rev. Mr Thayer, an American clergyman, who, being at Rome, witnessed several of them. With respect to miraculous cures of a late date, I have the most respectable attestation of several of them, and I am well acquainted with four or five persons who have experienced them. The following facts are respectively attested, but at much greater length, by the Rev. Thomas Sadler, of Trafford, near Manchester, and the Rev. J. Crathorne, of Garswood, near Wigan:—Joseph Lamb, of Eccles, near Manchester, now 28 years of age, on the 12th of August, 1814, fell from a hay-rick, four yards and a half high, by which accident it was conceived the spine of his back was broken. Certain it is, he could neither walk nor stand without crutches, down to the 2nd of October, and that he described himself as feeling the most exquisite pain in the back. On that day, having prevailed with much difficulty upon his father, who was then a Protestant, to take him in a cart, with his wife and two friends, Thomas Cutler and Eliz. Dooley, to Garswood, near Wigan, where the hand of F. Arrowsmith,* one of the Catholic priests who suffered death at Lancaster, for the exercise of his religion, in the reign of Charles I., is preserved, and has often caused wonderful cures; he got himself conveyed to the altar rails of the chapel, and there to be signed, on his back, with the sign of the cross, by that hand; when feeling a particular sensation and total change in himself, as he expressed it, he exclaimed to his wife—Mary, I can walk! This he did, without any help whatever, walking first into an adjoining room, and thence to the cart which conveyed him home. With his debility his pains also left him, and his back has continued well ever since. (August 6th, 1817.) These particulars the above named persons, all still living, are ready, as they were respectively witnesses of them, to declare upon oath. I have attestations of incurable cancers and other disorders being suddenly remedied by the same instrument of God's bounty; but it would be a tedious work to transcribe them, or the other attestations in my possession of a similar nature." Letter XXIII. pp. 87—89.

I have inserted this story at full length, though it occupies more space than it deserves, in order to show with what a face of brass Papists can gravely relate their "lying wonders;" and how they impose upon the poor credulous dupes of their deceit and cunning.

I need not say that I disbelieve this story; for I suppose none but a Papist can believe it to be any thing but a gross imposition. It has not so much as a feature of credibility in it; and the only thing wonderful about it, is, that it should be believed by any person capable of distinguishing his right hand from his left.

* I cannot find any account of this saint and martyr, in either the Protestant or Popish historians of that period, to which I have access; from which we may infer that his saintship was not then acknowledged.

This Joseph Lamb fell from a hay-rick, "by which accident it was conceived the spine of his back was broken;" but no means were used, so far as appears, to ascertain the fact. There was no surgeon called to certify the fracture, or the state of the body before or after the alleged cure. There are no witnesses of either the disease or the remedy, but persons interested in propagating a belief in the virtue of the wonderworking dead hand, except the father of Lamb, who was then a Protestant, but whose conversion to Popery was the consequence of the supposed miracle. This lets us into the secret of the matter. It was easy for the son to feign both the disease and the cure, for such a good purpose as the conversion of his father; and the priests, no doubt in the secret, knew how to do the work with becoming solemnity. Such tricks have been so common in the church of Rome, that they would have lost all interest and effect long ago, but for the besotted ignorance and stupidity of the people who submit both conscience and understanding to their ghostly guides. I request the reader to turn to page 224, and he will find an account of a young man, trained almost from his infancy, to counterfeit blindness, for the express purpose of making him the subject of a miracle at some convenient time; which must have been a much more difficult affair than that of Lamb feigning himself lame only from August till October.

Dr Milner gives us the particulars of two other cases of miraculous cures performed by St Wenefride, at her holy well. One of them is narrated in a letter to himself, dated Nov. 19th, 1809, by a Miss Maria Hornyold. Some writers have endeavoured to account for these cures from the effects of the cold bath; but I see no necessity of accounting for them at all; for I believe they are nothing more than the effects of deceiving and being deceived. There are impostors among beggars who can assume the appearance of almost any disease; and the wily priests know well how to make use of this art for impressing the belief of miraculous cures.

When the apostles of Christ went preaching the gospel, God was pleased to confirm their testimony, by "signs and wonders, and divers miracles, and gifts of the Holy Ghost." But when the truth of their testimony was confirmed, and received by the churches, in the apostolic writings, the truth was then left to make its way by its own evidence with the enlightening influence of the Holy Spirit, which Christ promised should remain with his disciples for ever: and to suppose that miracles are still necessary, is to say that the truth of the gospel is not yet sufficiently confirmed. What is it that Papists propose to establish by their miracles? Is it that Jesus is the Christ? This was the design of Christ's own miracles. Is it to prove that the apostles of Christ were his messengers, and spoke by his authority? This was the design of their miracles; this is what was established by them; and having this established, we have no more to ask for,—we have nothing to do but to receive their testimony, and obey what they commanded. This renders further miraculous interference quite unnecessary: and as God does nothing in vain, miracles must of course have ceased when the canon of divine revelation was closed: and persons who understand and believe what is written, will not look for new miracles, any more than for a new revelation.

But I return to the question, What is it that Papists propose to establish by their miracles? It is what we know from the word of God to be erroneous, superstitious, and idolatrous; such as, that there is a divine virtue in certain images,—in the relics of certain saints, as in the withered hand of Father Arrowsmith, and in the holy water of St Wenefride's well; and all this for the purpose of cherishing devotion, and religious worship to saints and images. This we know to be contrary to the word of God; we are sure no real miracle can be wrought to establish such impiety; and therefore what is pretended must be false; and we ought not to believe such things even though supported by what has the appearance of a miracle. The children of Israel were instructed by Moses that false prophets would arise among them; but they were commanded to beware of them; and not to believe any man who would tempt them to idolatry, though they did miraculous things, or what appeared to be such. See Deut. xiii. 1—18. In reference to this, the apostle Peter gives us warning of what should take place in the last days: "But there were false prophets among the people, even as there shall be false teachers among you."—"And through covetousness shall they make merchandise of you." 2 Ep. ii. 1—3. This prediction, and the history of the Church of Rome, will be found to agree in every particular. The mystery of iniquity, as described by the apostle Paul, was to come, "after the working of Satan, with all power, and signs, and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness," 2 Thess. ii. 8—10. And the Church of Rome has proved herself to be this mystery of iniquity, by her thousands of pretended miracles, by which she deceives the world.

After all, Dr Milner, in narrating what he calls miracles, intends to prove merely that his church is holy. He calls them the divine attestations of her sanctity. Now I do not recollect that any of the miracles recorded in scripture were wrought for such a purpose. If persons, or churches, are really holy, they can make this appear without a miracle; and I would most seriously suspect the character of any church that told me, it required a miracle to prove that they were holy. Genuine holiness, like the sun in the firmament, makes itself manifest by its own light. All men can observe and mark those who are humble, and self-denied, and benevolent; and who are living soberly and righteously in the world. It requires no miracle to prove that these are holy persons; but Dr Milner, perfectly aware that his church cannot bear to be tried by this standard, pleads to have her holiness proved by miracles!

I conclude this Number, and this subject, with the following curious statement by Dr Milner, by which the reader will see that there is an office in Rome, for recording and trying miracles, like our Sasine office for recording infeftments and dispositions:—"In the first place, then, a judicial examination of each reported miracle must be made in the place where it is said to have happened, and the depositions of the several witnesses must be given upon oath; this examination is generally repeated two or three different times at intervals. In the next place, the examiners at Rome are unquestionably men of character, talents, and learning, who, nevertheless, are not permitted to pronounce upon any cure or other effect in nature, till they have received a regular report of physicians and other naturalists upon it. So far from being precipitate, it employs them whole years to come to a decision, on a few cases, respecting each saint; this is printed and handed about among indifferent persons, previously to its being laid before the Pope. In short, so strict is the examination, that, according to an Italian proverb, —'it is next to a miracle to get a miracle proved at Rome.' It is reported by F. Daubenton, that an English Protestant gentleman meeting, in that city, with a process of forty miracles, which had been laid before the congregation of rites, to which the examination of them belonged, was so well satisfied with the respective proofs of them, as to express a wish that Rome would never allow of any miracles but such as were as strongly proved as these appeared to be; when, to his great surprise, he was informed that every one of these had been rejected by Rome as not sufficiently proved." Letter XXIV. p. 92.

No. CC.

SATURDAY, MAY 11TH, 1822.

DR MILNER introduces the subject of his third mark of the true church, that is, CATHOLICITY, in the following whining and canting manner:—"In treating of this third mark of the true church, as expressed in our common creed, I feel my spirits sink within me, and I am almost tempted to throw away my pen, in despair. For what chance is there of opening the eyes of candid Protestants to the other marks of the church, if they are capable of keeping them shut to this? Every time that each of them addresses the God of truth, either in solemn worship or in private devotion, he fails not to repeat;—I believe in THE CATHOLIC CHURCH: and yet if I ask him the question:—Are you a CATHOLIC? he is sure to answer me:—No, I am a PROTESTANT!—Was there ever a more glaring instance of inconsistency and self-condemnation among rational beings?" Letter XXV. p. 103.

I have often remarked that Popish authors make use of the strongest words when their facts and arguments are the weakest. Here Dr Milner expresses his unutterable astonishment at our Protestant stupidity; and almost throws himself into a fit of hysterics, and his pen into the fire, because, while we profess to believe in the Catholic church, we do not believe it to be the Church of Rome. This is all Jesuitical artifice, intended to confirm the men of his own communion in their blind adherence to their bigoted superstition; for he knows very well, that when we use the word Catholic, we do it in a sense quite consistent with our being Protestants; and that so far from conceding the word to the Church of Rome as exclusively hers, we positively deny that she has any title to it. This he must know, if he has read any of the standard works in defence of the Reformation; and yet he writes as if he did not know it.

The word CATHOLIC is very harmless, as understood by Protestants, of the church of the first-born who are written in heaven, of all kindreds, and tongues, and people, and nations. But as it is nowhere in scripture used to designate the true church on earth, I think the Protestant cause would suffer no loss by having it expunged from both our creed and our vocabulary. Dr Milner himself admits the fact, which every theologian and church historian knows, that this word was not originally in that short summary of belief, called the Apostles' Creed, but foisted in afterwards to serve a purpose. But though it were otherwise, I would reckon it of no importance, seeing it has not the sanction of any of those who wrote under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit; and this being the case, be the meaning of the word what it may, it can be of no use in ascertaining which is the true church. Dr Milner's third MARK, therefore, is no mark at all.

In different parts of my work, however, I have condescended to argue as if it were; and have shown that it does not, and never did belong to the Church of Rome. I need not again discuss the general question; but shall confine myself now to a few remarks on what Dr Milner has advanced under it.

He finds, it seems, that a Protestant cannot perform an act of devotion public or private, without repeating his belief in the Catholic Church, which indicates the most deplorable ignorance of Protestant worship; and it, at the same time, gives us to understand what Papists understand religious worship to be; that is, a mere mechanical process, or repetition of the Apostles' Creed, with perhaps the ten commandments. Now I believe there are thousands of Protestants, who do not question an article of the creed; but who yet never think of it in their devotions. It is enough for them to believe the divine record concerning Jesus Christ as the Way, and the Truth, and the Life, by whom alone they can come to the Father; to be convinced of their own necessities; and of the grace of God ready to supply them for Christ's sake; and therefore, in his name, to come to the throne of grace, that they may obtain mercy and find grace to help them. This, together with thanksgiving for mercy received, constitutes the devotion of a true Protestant; and it has no connection at all with the public or private recitation of a creed: but I suppose a Papist cannot understand this.

The following is a sort of crowning argument, intended to prove that the Church of Rome is Catholic, and therefore the true church:—"If any stranger in London, Edinburgh, or Amsterdam, were to ask his way to the Catholic chapel, I would risk my life for it, that no sober Protestant inhabitant would direct him to any other place of worship than ours." Letter XXV. p. 106. I am not accustomed to risk my life for such a trifle, but I will venture to assure Dr Milner, that if any stranger in Glasgow, or even London, were to ask his way to the Popish chapel, he would be directed to no other place of worship than his, or that of his Romish brethren, from which it is demonstrated that their religion is Popery, and nothing else. Nay, I will descend a great deal lower, and tell Dr Milner, that if any stranger in Glasgow were to ask for Mr Scott's chapel, he would be shown to no other than his, by which it is demonstrated that the Scottish is the only true church. I do not mean the Church of Scotland but the church of Scott, which is thus clearly proved, according to Dr Milner's logic, to be the church in preference of every other!

Speaking of the Church of England, he says, "With respect to this very church, nothing would be more inconsistent than to ascribe the greater part of the population of our islands to it. For if the Irish Catholics, the Scotch Presbyterians, the English Methodists, and other dissenters, together with the vast population who neither are, nor profess to be, of any religion at all, are subtracted, to what a comparatively small number would the Church of England be reduced! And how utterly absurd would it be for her to pretend to be the Catholic Church! Nor are these the only subtractions to be made from her number, and indeed from those of all other Christian societies, divided from the true church; since, there being but one baptism, all the young children who have been baptized in them, and all invincibly ignorant Christians, who exteriorly adhere to them, really belong to the Catholic church, as I have shown above." Letter XXV. p. 112.

I have quoted this merely to show that Dr Milner claims for the Church of Rome all the dissenters' children in the three kingdoms, except those of my Baptist friends, who, if the claim were to be sustained, would have a greater advantage from their being unchristened, than their parents are aware of; that is, the advantage of not being claimed by the Church of Rome, which is no small one, to those who consider that church as the Babylon that is to be destroyed. As for all the invincibly ignorant Christians, who are also claimed by Dr Milner as members of his church, he is perfectly welcome to them. Let him take them, and make the most he can of them. In their separation, the Protestant churches will obtain a great deliverance.

Let us attend to one argument more which Dr Milner adduces to prove the CATHOLICITY of his church:—"That the church in communion with the see of Rome is the original, as well as the most numerous church, is evident in several points of view. The stone cries out of the wall, as the prophet expresses it (Hab. ii. 11.) in testimony of this. I mean that our venerable cathedrals and other stone churches, built by Catholic hands and for Catholic worship, so as to resist, in some sort, that which is now performed in them, proclaim that ours is the ancient and original church." Ibid. p. 114. Dr Milner does not know, I suppose, that this argument would have much more weight in the mouth of a heathen. The Pagan temples in different parts of the world, for instance the Pantheon at Rome, are much older than any Popish cathedral. The stones of their walls cry that theirs is the most ancient religion; and I leave Dr Milner to answer them if he can.

As for the Popish cathedrals in Scotland, I believe there is just one remaining entire,—that of Glasgow; and I can assure Dr Milner, that, so far from resisting the Protestant doctrine, or lifting up its voice in favour of Popery, there is not a church, or meeting-house, or conventicle-house, of any name, in the three kingdoms, in which, during the memory of man, the genuine Protestant doctrine has been more faithfully preached; and, so far as I can learn, the stones of the wall, chill and damp as they are, never gave the preacher any disturbance. And, though the ashes of St Kentigern, and I do not know how many Popish saints, are lying there, not one of them has moved a tongue or a finger, "to resist," in any sort, "that which is now performed" by the Protestant worshippers. I believe, however, none of these saints were hanged for treasonable practices; they were not in this sense martyrs for their religion, and, therefore, it may be, that their relics cannot perform such wonders as the withered hand of Father Arrowsmith, as recorded in my last Number.

Dr Milner next proceeds to prove the Church of Rome to be the true church from her APOSTOLICITY. My readers will perhaps not understand the meaning of this word; and I question if they will find it in any English dictionary. It is, however, so nearly allied to apostolical, that it either does, or ought to mean, that the church which pretends to this character, ought to be, in every respect, such a church as the apostles planted in Jerusalem, and in other places. Jerusalem, we all know, was the mother church. In her was fulfilled the ancient prophecy, "The law shall go forth of Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem." Let us see what sort of a church this was, and then let us inquire whether the Church of Rome be like it. It consisted of a hundred and twenty men and women, including eleven apostles, or twelve after they had supplied the place of Judas, at the first meeting, after Christ's ascension, of which we have any detailed account. They were all genuine disciples of Christ; at least so far as was known to one another. I think this is clearly implied in the account which the inspired writer gives of them, Acts i. 14. "They all continued with one accord in prayer and supplication;" and we may easily judge what discord one known unbeliever would have made among them, considering the well known temper of the unbelievers of that day; for there was no such thing then as paying decent respect to Christian worship, as a compliment to public opinion, as is done by many unbelievers of the present day. On the day of Pentecost, that is, about ten days after Christ had ascended into heaven, the Holy Ghost came upon the disciples, as described in the second chapter of the Acts, when, by the preaching of the apostles, especially of Peter, the small original church received an addition of three thousand members. These had been among the betrayers and murderers of the Lord of glory; for Peter told them plainly,—"God hath made that same Jesus whom ye crucified, both Lord and Christ." They had joined with the rest of their countrymen in that horrid imprecation;—"His blood be on us and on our children!" "Away with him! crucify him!"—and that blood did come upon them in a way that they had never thought of or expected:—it came upon them for the salvation of their souls; for such was the generosity and clemency of the divine Saviour, that he instructed his apostles to begin their ministry at Jerusalem, that his very murderers might be the first to hear of his exaltation as a Prince and a Saviour, to give repentance and remission of sins. Accordingly, on that great festival, when many thousands were assembled at the place of public resort, the apostles began to preach. The people in general were astonished, and deeply affected by what they heard; and three thousand were pricked to the heart. They were deeply convinced of their guilt in general, and of this great crime in particular; and found themselves worthy of everlasting perdition. But when Peter told them of the mercy of God, as displayed in the gift of that very Saviour whom they had crucified; and had called them to repent and be baptized in the name of Christ, for the remission of their sins, they believed the glad tidings, for such it was to them. They gladly received the word, and were baptized, and were added to the church; and they adorned their new connection by a new character. The multitude of them that believed were of one heart and one soul;—and great grace was upon them all. Many more than these may have been also pricked to the heart, and filled with remorse and confusion, who yet refused the proffered salvation, and would go away contradicting and blaspheming, as was the case with the great body of that nation, though the gospel was preached to them; but the church in Jerusalem appear as a grateful company of saved sinners, whose great concern was to live to the glory of their Saviour.

This was the parent stock; and the first branches possessed the same character. These were the churches in Judea, and Galilee, and Samaria; who not only endured the fire of persecution, but when they obtained rest, (which is perhaps more trying to the faith of Christians,) after the conversion of Paul, it is testified of them, that "they were edified, and, walking in the fear of God, and in the comfort of the Holy Ghost, were multiplied," Acts ix. 31. Throughout the remainder of the New Testament, we find the churches uniformly described as consisting of men who were separated from the world, which lieth in wickedness, and different from the men of the world in their spirit, and conduct, and whole conversation. The distinction between Jew and Gentile was never more prominently marked in the time of Israel's greatest prosperity, than that between Christians and the men of the world is marked by the apostles in all their writings. "We are of God, little children," says the apostle John. A presumptuous and arrogant assumption, some would say; and so it was, had it not been true. But the truth of the statement is undeniable from its being written under the inspiration of the Holy Ghost; and it is repeated with the addition of what will be still more offensive to the carnal mind of the merely nominal Christian:—"We know that we are of God, and the whole world lieth in wickedness;" (1 John v. 19.) that is, the whole human race, who had not embraced the gospel of Christ, were lying in wickedness, or in obedience to the wicked one, namely, the devil. Now it was only those who were of God, and who were distinguished from the world, lying in subjection to the wicked one, that composed the apostolic churches. It is a fact that false brethren did occasionally creep in unawares,—that hypocrites, for wicked and selfish purposes, found admission into churches. But the guilt of this rested with themselves. The churches were not to blame, unless they consented to, or connived at, their continuing in church fellowship, after their hypocrisy was detected.

I find that these apostolic churches had bishops or pastors set over them, for their spiritual instruction and edification; and deacons ordained to be among them, for the purpose of ministering to the wants of the poor, out of the churches' bounty. We have the qualifications of these bishops and deacons very particularly described; for the divine wisdom foresaw, that according as their character might be, such would be also that of the churches over which they were placed. Let us see then what sort of persons bishops were to be. "A bishop then must be blameless, the husband of one wife, vigilant, sober, of good behaviour, given to hospitality, apt to teach; not given to wine, no striker, not given to filthy lucre, but patient; not a brawler, not covetous; one that ruleth well his own house, having his children in subjection with all gravity; (for if he know not how to rule his own house, how shall he take care of the church of God?) not a novice, lest being lifted up with pride, he fall into the condemnation of the devil. Moreover, he must have a good report of them who are without; lest he fall into reproach and the snare of the devil!" 1 Tim. iii. 2—7. The character and qualifications of deacons are described, in the same chapter, with equal minuteness, and in language so plain as not to be mistaken. Now, there can be no doubt, that, when the apostles superintended the churches, the character of the bishops, deacons, and also the body of the people, would be such as is above described. I enter not at all into the inquiry, what was the form of their church government? This, though by no means a matter of indifference, I hold to be of very inferior importance. The point which I wish to establish, is, that the apostolic churches were composed of men and women, who professed the faith of Christ, and proved the genuineness of their faith by holiness of life; and that, as members of his body, they held fellowship with one another, under the pastoral oversight of men of like character with themselves, but distinguished by a greater degree of gifts and graces, suitable to the importance and responsibility of their office. It was no very difficult matter, and it required no complicated machinery, to govern churches which were of one heart and soul,—walking in the fear of God, and the comfort of the Holy Ghost; yet even for such there was a government necessary; and one was ordained. Pastors were appointed to teach, and to rule in the fear of God; and the people were required to submit to them that had the rule over them. But while the apostles' doctrine was held fast, and their authority alone regarded as the rule, the people would fall as naturally into the right form of church government, as the battalions of a well disciplined army fall into order at the sound of the trumpet. "The law was not made for righteous men," as an apostle tells us, "but for the lawless and disobedient." 1 Tim. i. 9. So modern systems of church government, I fear, call them by what name you will, were not made for such churches as the apostles planted; but for carnal and worldly-minded men, that they might be made the subjects of a sort of Christian restraint, though not converted to Christ, and separated from the world.

I am quite aware that great corruptions in doctrine and practice appeared in some of the apostolic churches, especially in that at Corinth, and in those of Galatia, and in some of the seven churches in Asia; and from this circumstance the Head of the church took occasion to instruct his people how they should conduct themselves when such corruptions arose. They were commanded to keep themselves pure, and to put away from among them every member who had departed from the faith, or from holy practice; knowing that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump, they were instructed to purge out the old leaven; that is, to separate whatever had a tendency to withdraw their minds from the spiritual simplicity of Christ's gospel, or their practice from conformity with his law. And the fact of corruption appearing in a church did not infer the condemnation of that church, if they did not consent to it, or suffer it to remain uncorrected. Erring and immoral church members had all to bear their own burden, when the church, on being unable to reclaim them, put them away; but if the church did not reclaim, or put away such members, she was justly doomed to bear her part of the burden. Then it became the duty of those among them, who loved and wished to obey the Saviour in all things, to attend to what was necessary for their own purity. They were commanded to withdraw from every brother who walked disorderly, and who refused to be reclaimed; which necessarily implies the duty of withdrawing from any number of brethren,—even from a whole church, when found disorderly and irreclaimable: so that the Reformers were guilty of no schism, but were only obeying a divine command, when they separated from the Church of Rome.

It is time now to apply these evidently scriptural principles to the Church of Rome. She boasts above all others, to be the holy, Catholic, APOSTOLICAL church; that is, if the words have any meaning, such a church as the apostles planted and watered by their personal ministry. Are her members then, in general, such as were the members of the churches in Judea, Galilee, and Samaria,—"walking in the fear of God?" I suspect that if the best of them were tried by this rule, they would be deplorably deficient; and as for thousands of them in Ireland, and not a few nearer home, they seem to live in the fear of nothing but the priest and the gallows; and a great number manifest no great fear even of these, at least of the latter, as is evident from the great proportion of Papists who appear in our criminal calendar. Dr Milner claims for the Church of Rome all invincibly ignorant Christians, as we have seen above, because they do not belong to any Protestant church; and by the same rule, he will claim as his beloved children in the faith, all incorrigibly wicked Christians. He is indeed very welcome to them; and no one will deny that such form a large proportion of the Church of Rome, if it be lawful to profane the word Christian by such a use of it; but this proves her to be the very reverse of an apostolical church. For illustration and proof of this point, I refer to my 197th Number, in which the deplorable wickedness of all ranks and classes in the "holy Catholic church," is described at length by approved authors of her own communion.

No. CCI.

SATURDAY, MAY 18TH, 1822.

The Reader is requested to connect the following with the conclusion of the last Number.

BUT when Papists speak of the Church they mean particularly the clergy. I have shown, then, what sort of men the apostolic bishops were, which applies equally to the elders, or priests, (priest being merely a contraction of the Greek word presbyter.) Let us now try the Apostolicity of the Popish clergy by this rule. "A bishop then must be blameless." The clergy, says Nicholas Clemangis, are the dregs and scum of mankind, persons who abandon themselves to the most loathsome vices. See much more to the same purpose, certified by great Popish authors, in No. 197. A bishop, and of course likewise a priest or elder, must be the husband of one wife. I do not think this means that he must necessarily be a married man, though the words literally express this, as plainly as those on which the Church of Rome found their transubstantiation express that dogma. From the lax morality of both Jews and Gentiles on the subject of marriage, it is presumable that some of the Christian converts had a plurality of wives; an evil which could not well be remedied, without injustice to one party at least, until death should operate a cure; but the apostolic injunction required that no man in that unseemly and unchristian-like state, should be called to fill any office in the churches. But nothing can be more evident than that the words admit the lawfulness of bishops being married; they even take it for granted that they have families of children. But how stands it with the Church of Rome? she makes it absolutely unlawful for her priests to marry; and if the apostle Peter himself were to appear among them, though the Popes pretend to derive all their authority from him, the first act of their authority towards him would be to make him put away his wife. Their opposition to the apostolic churches here would not be so glaring, if they lived chastely in their unmarried state. But the fact is notoriously the reverse, for which I refer again to Number 197, and to those Numbers which treat of clerical celibacy. The fact is, the Popish priests no more resemble the apostolical bishops, in this respect, than the idol of impurity resembles Joseph. There may be individual exceptions; but I speak of their prevailing character; and from ecclesitical historians of their own, we learn that, instead of ruling their own houses well in the fear of God, the great concern of those who were wealthy, was to make handsome provision for their bastards.

The apostle Peter was an example of what a pastor ought to be; and he gave a very plain description for the guidance of the churches in all ages. "The elders who are among you I exhort, who am also an elder, and a witness of the sufferings of Christ, and also a partaker of the glory that shall be revealed. Feed the flock of God which is among you, taking the oversight thereof, not by constraint, but willingly; not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind; neither as being lords over God's heritage, but being ensamples to the flock," 1 Epist. v. 1—3. Try the Apostolicity of the Church of Rome according to the rule here laid down, by him whom she professes to regard as her founder, and the opposition will be found as great as that between God and Baal. Instead of not seeking filthy lucre, it would seem as if the clergy sought nothing else but that, and the sensual gratifications which it can procure; and if they are not lords over God's heritage, it is because this inheritance has withdrawn from their lordship; but over those who do submit to their authority, they lord it more than any despot on the face of the earth.

It is equally easy to show, that in point of doctrine the Church of Rome is the very opposite of the apostolic churches. I might confine myself to the discourses and epistles of Peter, whom they claim as their founder; and by these it could be shown that his pretended successors have departed from the faith; that, in short, these would-be successors of his, are the very false teachers, against whom he enters his caveat, in the second chapter of his second epistle. Let the reader attentively compare what is written there, with the characters of Popery, and of Popish priests, as they have been exhibited in different parts of my work, from their own writers, and he will be struck with the resemblance.

The Church of Rome has had the credit of maintaining the orthodox doctrine, after many other churches had embraced great errors; such, for instance, as the Arian heresy, which afterwards merged itself in the Socinian; denying the divinity and atonement of Christ. It is true, the Church of Rome made a bold stand for a time, in defence of the truth in these points; but eventually she fell into the same errors, in a more subtile form; which were therefore the more insinuating and dangerous. It was too much, even upon the verge of the dark ages, to persuade Christians in general, that their Saviour, whom they had been taught to worship, was a mere creature, and that he did not make atonement for the sins of his people; but the same satanic object was effected by persuading men to worship mere creatures, and to trust in the merits of creatures, and in their own penances. This I believe was a work of the devil's planning; for the leading men in the church had not foresight enough to perceive the result of certain early, and apparently slight, aberrations from the truth, which issued in the grand apostasy, which the Church of Rome has exhibited for many centuries; that is, the antichrist, of which the apostle John said, it shall come, and even now it is in the world; and, "He is antichrist who denieth the Father and the Son," 1 Epist. ii. 22. The apostle Peter spoke of the same thing, when he said of the false teachers, they "shall bring in damnable heresies, even denying the Lord that bought them," 2 Epist. ii. 1. The leading character of this antichrist is,—denying the divinity and the atonement of Christ. This was done in two ways; first, by bringing him down to the level of a mere creature: this was for the learned and philosophical professors of Christianity; but there was something too shocking and violent in this, for the bulk of the people. The second method served the purpose much better; that was to bring up certain creatures to the rank and place of the Saviour. Some of these creatures were saints and martyrs,—whose memory was held in great veneration; and persons who would have shuddered at the thought of degrading Christ, experienced no such feeling when his friends and martyrs were exalted,—when they were held as entitled to a sort of relative honour,—when they were considered as intercessors in heaven, and had prayers addressed to them as such. This had not the revolting appearance of directly robbing Christ of his glory, as the Arian and Socinian doctrine had; and of course, it gained ground more extensively. It was, however, the very same antichrist; for Christ is as much dishonoured by the presumption of raising a creature to his level, as by the impiety of bringing him down to the level of a creature.

These are the leading features of the antichrist, who makes such a prominent figure in the apocalyptic parts of scripture. The one is the opposition of science and worldly wisdom; the other is the opposition of bloated ignorance and superstition. Each has a multitude of ramifications; and they seem in many points to be directly opposed to each other; but both agree in creature-worship, and creature-merit; and thus they are both alike subversive of genuine Christianity; and as far as possible removed from the character of Apostolicity. My present business is with the Church of Rome only; but if I can prove, as I think I can, that she symbolizes with Socinianism, this will go a great way to prove, to the conviction of many readers, that she is not an apostolical church.

It will be recollected that Dr Milner shows a disposition to magnify Socinianism, by insinuating that the churches of England and Scotland have almost universally gone into it; and by asserting that most Protestants of eminence deny that the divinity of Christ can be proved from scripture alone. (See PROT. No. 192.) Popish writers lay great stress upon the concessions of Protestants; and thus Dr Milner does what he can to serve the Socinian cause; which leads me to devote a few pages to the subject of the Socinianism of Popery, in which I have little more to do than to give a few extracts translated from a very curious and scarce work, which, I believe, was never translated into English. It is entitled, "Roma Racoviana, et Racovia Romana: That is, the full and exact Agreement of Papists and Socinians, in many of the points of their religion, and those the most important. In which the soul and marrow of both religions is clearly shown to be one and the same: and that one and the same spirit reigns in each apostasy," &c. by William Jamieson, Edinburgh, 1702.

In his epistle dedicatory he informs us, that the Papists and Socinians, to whom, he says, all other sects may be reduced, or classed under, have generally been considered as diametrically opposite; but that it is his intention in this treatise to demonstrate their firm unity and concord; and that their principles, spirit, end, and scope, are the same; and that therefore, they are but two branches of that great apostasy, which was predicted in the holy scriptures: and that this Babylonian apostasy is the universal gangrene, the poison of all former heresies, the mother of abominations, and the turbulent sea by which the Lord's field is inundated. He then pays a high tribute to the memory of King William, for his delivering the nation from Popery; which I mention here because it has become fashionable in certain circles, to speak slightingly of this truly great and liberal-minded prince, and to look upon those who profess to respect his memory as illiberal bigots. It is, however, no small testimony, on his behalf, that his glory appeared most bright to those who stood near it;—that the deliverance which he effected was most appreciated by those who were personally the subjects of that deliverance; and that he is lightly thought of only by persons who live at a distance, and who know only by report the grievous thraldom from which he emancipated the subjects of these kingdoms.

"Thus," says our author, "the Romanists deny the holy scriptures to be the last judge of controversy. The Socinians in words condemn this; but who does not see that they agree in fact?—they make a derision of innumerable passages of scripture, clearer than the meridian sun. Again, the Socinians deny Christ's divinity; the Papists expressly assert it; but they most impudently affirm that this doctrine cannot be proved from scripture; and affirm positively that the primitive fathers were infected with Arianism, or left nothing against it;—and they also overthrow the doctrine by allowing divine worship to creatures; thus they make common cause with the Socinians, and agree with them in practice, though they cry out against them. And as the Socinians worship Christ, whom they yet denominate a mere creature, so also the Papists worship the Virgin Mary, and the Pope; and I hope to show their agreement to the satisfaction of the candid reader." Sect. I. What he says here about worshipping Christ, believing him to be a mere creature, applies to the older Socinians. The modern ones, of the Priestleian school, more consistently deny all worship to Christ; and it is well known, that for such consistency Socinus himself persecuted Davides one of his own brethren.

Section second. Of the scripture we read as follows:—I. "The word of God is verbally acknowledged, and even at times honoured, by both Papists and Socinians. Cornelius A. Lapide, Justinian, and other Popish commentators on Tim. iii. 15.—the Council of Trent, Sess. I. and Bellarmine, de Verbo Dei, lib. I. cap. ii. There is nothing, says he, more certain, or better known than the sacred scriptures, contained in the prophetic and apostolic writings, so that it must be the most egregious folly to deny that faith is to be had in them. That they are well known the whole Christian world is witness; and the consent of all nations, where for many ages they have attained the chief authority; they are also most true and certain, and contain, not human inventions, but divine oracles, of which the first testimony is the truth of the prophecies, &c. Socinus himself, in more than one of his published works, owns the authority of holy scripture. The Racovian Catechism, cap. i. Valkelius de Vera Religione, lib. V. cap. v. Slightingius, in 2 Tim. iii. 15, 16.

"II. But both parties cry out that the originals, the Hebrew and Greek, are corrupted. Bellarmine, de Verbo Dei, lib. II. cap. ii. Palavicino, Hist. con. Trid. part. I. lib. VI. cap. xvii. num. 3. 'They are so ambiguous, and so corrupt, that almost no sense can be drawn out of them.' And 'the Hebrew originals have been corrupted by the Jews our enemies; and the Greek, by Grecian heretics and schismatics.' So Canus, Sixtus, Senensis, &c. 'Among the Hebrews there are innumerable ambiguous words which have been the cause of much contention.' Bale, the Jesuit, Catech. Tract. I. Quest. 4. 'The original is lying.'

"To the Papists agree the Socinians. Thus the Racovian Catechism;—'There seems to exist a corruption of the scripture in things of lesser moment.' Socinus, vol. I. p. 270. 'Now respecting the corruption of the holy scriptures,—if any man will say that it is most likely, that in the space of so many ages, when so many copies have been wrote out, that in many places they are changed, truly I will not deny it.' Another of their writers, in his disputation against the Jews,—'There are many traces of corruption and depravation by the fault of the writers, exist in the New Testament.' Also, Quest. 24. p. 115.—'When the Old Testament has received so many wounds, either through the carelessness or ignorance of librarians, it need not be wondered if the same have happened to the New Testament.

"III. The Papists maintain that 'the apostles and evangelists, having received no command, wrote as occasion or circumstances required,' Bale, Tract. I. Quest. 2. Bellar. De Verbo Dei, lib. IV. cap. iv.—Socinus, vol. I. p. 267. 'The oppositions or diversities, either true or apparent, which are in things of small moment, belong to history.' Valk. de Vera Rel. lib. V. cap. v. 'There is a real diversity in the scriptures, though in things of no, or at any rate of small, moment to a happy life.' And Grotius, as cited by Hornbeck, Socin. Conf. Trin. i. p. 6. 'All the books in the Hebrew canon were not dictated by the Holy Spirit.' And, 'if Luke had written by divine inspiration, he would have claimed authority from thence, as the prophets did, and not from the witnesses he had been informed by.'

"IV. Bellarmine, de Verbo Dei, lib. IV. cap. iv. and Bale, Tract. I. Quest. 3. affirm, that many of the canonical books have perished. The same is the opinion of Socinus and Valkelius, de Vera Religione, lib. V. cap. v. 'It is understood that many of the books of the Old Testament have perished.'

"V. Pope worshippers deny that inferences may be deduced from scripture. Veronius, cap. iii. Arnoux, Art. V. Bale, Tract. I. Quest. 9. 'Where is it plainly written that there are three persons in the Trinity? Where is the Holy Spirit said to proceed from the Father and the Son, as is determined by the councils?' A careless reader would be apt to suppose that Bale meant to decry the councils; but a closer acquaintance with the genius of Popery would convince him of the reverse. His object is to show that we are indebted to the councils, not to scripture, for the definition of Catholic doctrine.

"Bellarmine contends that 'we are in no wise justified by the imputed righteousness of Christ.' De Justif. lib. II. cap. vii. And Bale, Tract. IV. Quest. 10. 'The scriptures nowhere use these words, Faith alone justifies.' In this the Socinians are willing disciples of the Papists;—'Whatever is necessary to salvation must be fully and literally written out in holy writ.' Smalcius, p. 1. And again, 'How can that be said to be necessary to salvation, which is only drawn by consequence from holy scripture?' p. 70. Crellius, de Uno Deo Patre, lib. I. sect. 3. cap. i. uses this argument against the deity of the Holy Ghost,—'The Holy Spirit is nowhere in holy writ plainly called God.'

"VI. The Papists believe with the Socinians that all that is necessary to be believed or performed is not to be found in scripture. See Bellarmine de Verbo Dei, lib. IV. cap. iv. and Bale, Tract. I. Quest. 9. The Socinians worship their Christ, a mere man, with divine worship. Valkel. lib. V. cap. xxix. 'It follows that we oppose that most pestilent opinion that Christ is not to be worshipped.' Yet he denies this worship to be commanded in scripture, lib. IV. cap. ix.

"VII. The Papists deny the necessity of the assistance of the Holy Spirit for understanding the scriptures savingly. Becanus, lib. III. cap. x. Bale, Tract. I. Quest. 17. The same is affirmed by the Socinians,"—of which abundant evidence is adduced.

I find it would be endless to extract all that the author has collected on this subject. Papists and old Socinians seem evidently to have regarded the word of God with equal contempt; and as for the modern ones, I think Dr Milner is fairly entitled to be classed with Dr Priestley. The latter gentleman accused the apostles of reasoning "inconclusively," and Moses of giving a "lame account" of the creation; which is only a more honest way of expressing his contempt for the inspired writings, than Dr Milner's affected respect for them, while he contemns them for being an insufficient Rule of faith.

This Mr Jamieson, (who he was I do not know,) fills a small quarto volume with quotations from Popish and Socinian writers, which prove not only the similarity, but the identity of the two systems, in relation to the fundamental doctrines of Christianity; such as, the trinity; the state of man, and his fall; providence; grace, and free will; of the law; of Christ; of justification; of the church and the sacraments; and of the frauds, and desperate cause of the two sects. I might fill several Numbers with extracts on these subjects; but I am afraid my readers would think them extremely dry. If I have shown that the systems are the same in their contempt of the holy scriptures, it will be understood as comprising every subject of divine revelation, according to the well-known geometrical axiom,—the whole must comprehend all its parts. It is worth while, however, to add a few modern examples to those ancient ones which Mr Jamieson has collected with so much industry.

I take Dr Milner to be the oracle of living Papists; and he tells us in his eighth letter;—"If Christ had intended that all mankind should learn his religion from a book, namely, the New Testament, he himself would have written that book,"&c. Now as we know Christ did not write the New Testament with his own hand, Dr Milner's inference unavoidably is, that we are not to receive our religion from it, and that it is not to be depended upon. Again,—"It does not even appear that he gave his apostles any command to write the gospel." See as above. Then it follows that the apostolic writings were unauthorized, and of course without authority. Such indeed is the scope of the whole of Dr Milner's 8th letter, of which a more particular account will be found in my 193d Number. Let us see now how modern Socinians treat the sacred volume. Dr Priestley, speaking of reverence for it, says,—"Not that I consider the books of scripture as inspired, and on that account entitled to this high degree of respect, but as authentic records of the the dispensations of God to mankind, with every particular of which we cannot be too well acquainted."—"The writers of the books of scripture were men, and therefore fallible; but all that we have to do with them is in the character of historians and witnesses of what they heard and saw."—"Like all other historians, they were liable to mistakes, with respect to things of small moment, because they might not give sufficient attention to them; and with respect to their reasoning we are at full liberty to judge of it as well as that of other men, by a due consideration of the propositions they advance, and the arguments they allege. For it by no means follows, because a man has had communications with the deity for certain purposes, and he may be depended upon with respect to his account of those communications, that he is in other respects more wise and knowing than other men." Letters to a Philosophical Unbeliever, part II. preface, page xiii. also Letter V. In his Letters to the Philosophers and Politicians of France, Dr. Priestley says: "That the books of scripture were written by particular divine inspiration, is a thing to which the writers themselves make no pretensions. It is a notion destitute of all proof, and that has done great injury to the evidence of Christianity," p. 38.

The Monthly Review, a well known organ of this sect, lays down the Socinian doctrine relating to the scriptures thus:—"The nature and design of the scriptures is not to settle disputed theories, nor to decide upon speculative controverted questions, even in religion and morality.—The scriptures, if we understand any thing of them, are not intended so much to make us wiser, as to make us better; not to solve the doubts, but rather to make us obey the dictates of our consciences." March 1793, p. 357. See this subject discussed in a masterly manner, in Letter XII. of Fuller's Systems Compared, one of the ablest controversial works in the English language. It was well said by one of the Reviewers, when this work appeared, that the great philosopher, (Priestley) in the hands of the plain Baptist minister, whose education extended little beyond common English, was no more than a dwarf in the hands of a giant.

No. CCII.

SATURDAY, MAY 25TH, 1822.

THE reader must not suppose from what I have said of Socinianism, that I intend to make war against any sect of Protestants. This would very ill become THE PROTESTANT, who has received such countenance from all denominations to whom the name belongs. But Socinianism does not belong to Protestantism. It is as far removed from it as Popery itself. The deity and atonement of Christ are as essential to the Protestant religion, as is freedom from the tyranny of Rome. This I suppose will not be denied by any Socinian, and of course those of that persuasion cannot properly call themselves Protestants. There may be individuals of Socinian principles in communion with Protestant churches, just as concealed Papists may be,—to the shame of both be it said; but to call any Protestant church Socinian, would be as unjust as to call it Popish.

Popery and Socinianism decidedly agree in this:—that there is an authority among men superior to the scriptures, by which the scriptures are to be tried, and have their meaning determined. This may be called the nucleus of the two systems. Here they unite in a common centre; and this establishes their identity, notwithstanding the fact that they diverge from it in many different directions. The authority which Papists set over the scriptures, is the church and tradition; that which the Socinians set over it, is reason and conscience. "I have proved to you," says Dr Milner, "that the whole business of the scriptures belongs to the church. She has preserved them, she vouches for them, and she alone, by confronting the several passages with each other, and by the help of tradition, authoritatively explains them." Letter XII. See the whole passage in PROT. No. 193. Compare this with the doctrine of the Socinian Reviewer quoted in last Number:—"The scriptures were intended —not to solve the doubts,—but rather to make us obey the dictates of our conscience.' Here conscience is put where Papists put the church. Its authority is supreme. It receives not information from scripture as to what is right or wrong, true or false; for this must be the meaning of not being intended to solve doubts, else there is no meaning in the words; but conscience itself determines what is right, and what ought to be done; and scripture is brought in only as an auxiliary to enforce obedience to this supreme authority, this idol Socinians exalt above the word of God, as Papists do the church.

The two systems are only different modifications of the one apostasy, which originated in man's departure from God, at the fall. They are both the religion of corrupt human nature, which refuses to submit to the will, and wisdom, and righteousness of God; and which would exalt the creature above all that is called God, and that is worshipped. But they are calculated for very different states of society. Popery suits a state of besotted ignorance, vice, and superstition; and when the devil held what was called Christendom in bondage by these, he found little use for his other instrument; and, therefore, what we call Socinianism, was little heard of during the dark ages. But when the adversary found that the Reformation had given so much light to the world, that he could not hope to rule much longer by means of ignorance, he laid hold of the other branch of the system, by means of which he tried to maintain his dominion over the souls of men. The revival of the old error, which took the name of Socinus, was almost coeval with Luther's reformation; and by this the carnal, inquisitive, philosophical mind was fascinated, and diverted from the simplicity of Christ's gospel, and of course from Christ's salvation, as really as the gross and superstitious mind had been diverted from it, by means of tradition, holy water, and lying wonders.

Let the reader observe, that my aim in this and last Number, is to show the identity of Popery and Socinianism. I am not speaking of Papists and Socinians, personally; or by any means intending to insinuate, much less to assert, that the prevailing character of the two bodies is the same. Where ignorance is held to be the mother of devotion, and where the great aim of public teachers is to keep the people in ignorance, the state of taste, morals, and every thing must be very low. But the Socinians do not cultivate ignorance upon principle. In respect of literature, and all the decencies of enlightened society, they are not behind their Protestant neighbours. They acknowledge no foreign power, civil or religious; they do not profess that it is lawful to propagate their principles by force, or to punish men for heresy; and therefore they ought not to be regarded as dangerous neighbours, or in any respect incapable of being good subjects and useful members of society, in any department which they are qualified to occupy.

I have thus endeavoured to show, that in point of doctrine, as well as in the prevailing character of her members, the Church of Rome is the reverse of apostolical. I have not gone into a detail of doctrinal errors, with which I might have filled a few Numbers; but have rather fixed on one great prominent heresy, which contains in its bosom every thing that is opposed to the gospel of Christ; and having shown that the Church of Rome identifies itself with this heresy, by setting human authority over the word of God, it is not necessary that I should descend to a minute analysis of her subordinate errors.

But it is time to attend to what Dr Milner means by the Apostolicity of his church. This is neither evangelical doctrine nor holy life. It is something which he describes as "succession" from the apostles. It is something like the carnal descent of a noble or royal family: according to which, if a man can prove his propinquity, he claims the estates and the honours of some ancient family. Thus Dr Milner lays down the noble, or rather sacerdotal, succession of himself and his brethren, down to the lowest parish priest, in the most ignorant part of the world:—"Thus, my dear Sir, every Catholic pastor is authorised and enabled to address his flock as follows:—'The word of God which I announce to you, and the holy sacraments which I dispense to you, I am QUALIFIED to announce and dispense by such a Catholic bishop, who was consecrated by such another Catholic bishop, and so on, in a series which reaches to the apostles themselves: and I am AUTHORIZED to preach and minister to you by such a prelate, who received authority, for this purpose, from the successor of St Peter, in the apostolic see of Rome.'" Letter XXIX. p. 139. In reading such contemptible nonsense, one's mind is unavoidably brought into contact with childish things. The reader must therefore bear with me when I say, that this account of Popish succession forcibly reminded me of "the house that Jack built."

This article of apostolical succession is one of the most absurd figments that even Popery itself can produce; for though it were possible for modern priests to prove that they have come in an unbroken line of succession from the apostles, it would be of no use to them, unless they brought also the doctrine of the apostles; and even then it would be of no use to them; for their bringing of the apostles' doctrine, and exhibiting the holy life which it produces, would serve every purpose of an evangelical ministry, without the succession. But this succession they cannot possibly prove; and therefore upon the principle of its being a mark of the true church, they must stand condemned, because they are found wanting. In a late Number I stated the fact, that there had been many great schisms in the Church of Rome, some of them continuing for many years, during which period rival Popes excommunicated each other, while each created cardinals, and performed all the functions competent to the head of the church. One at least of these heads (for there were three at one time) must necessarily have been false: all the spiritual functions derived from the false head must have been false likewise; the priests who derived their powers from such a source were no priests; the bishops consecrated in virtue of such authority were no bishops; and all their ordinations were null and void; and no bishop or priest of the present day can prove that he is come of the right line; therefore all that they build upon the notion of their apostolical succession falls to the ground.

Let us see how Dr Milner attempts to get over this difficulty:—"I grant, Sir, that, from the various commotions and accidents to which all sublunary things are subject, there have been several vacancies, or interregnums in the Papacy; but none of them have been of such a lengthened duration, as to present a moral continuation of the Popedom, or to hinder the execution of the important offices annexed to it. I grant also, that there have been rival Popes and unhappy schisms in the church, particularly one great schism at the end of the fourteenth and the beginning of the fifteenth century: still the true Pope was always clearly discernible at the times we are speaking of, and in the end was acknowledged even by his opponents."—When and by whom was this discerned; and when was this acknowledgment made by opposing pontiffs? This is a mere assertion of the doctor's own, without so much as an attempt to adduce evidence in support of it: and supposing his assertion were true as to the opposing Popes themselves, what became of the many thousands of bishops and priests who derived spiritual faculties from them? Were they turned back to the rank of mere laymen upon the degradation of the Popes that made them? No such thing. This is not so much as pretended; and those who received ordination and consecration from the false Pope, and those who received the same from them and their successors, cannot now be distinguished from those who derived these faculties from the true Pope; so that there is not a priest in the world who can prove his apostolical pedigree.

But Dr Milner continues :—"Lastly, I grant that a few of the Popes, perhaps a tenth of the whole number, [nine tenths would have been nearer the truth] swerving from the example of the rest, have, by their personal vices, disgraced their holy station : but even these Popes always fulfilled their public duties to the church, by maintaining the apostolical doctrine, moral as well as speculative, the apostolical orders, and the apostolical mission." Letter XXX. p. 154. Here we have something that seems to border on the miraculous ; and I hope Dr Milner will thank me for pointing it out to the world, as it may tend to his canonization a hundred years after his death ;—it is, that Popes, who by their personal vices disgraced their holy station, yet always fulfilled their public duties to the church. We Protestants, in our simplicity, have been accustomed to think that the first public duty which a pastor owes to the church, is, to give them an example of personal purity. —Keep THYSELF pure, was a charge which Paul gave to Timothy, obedience to which was essential to his profiting others by his ministry ; but Dr Milner does most miraculously reconcile personal vices, which disgraced the holy station of the Popes, with perfection of public duty, in those whose duty it was to be examples to the flock, "in word, in conversation, in charity, in spirit, in faith, in purity." 1 Tim. iv. 12. I entreat Dr Milner to publish a satisfactory account of the process by which the holy fathers of Rome, who disgrace their holy station by their personal vices, are yet able always to fulfil their public duties to the church. If he can give a satisfactory explanation of this mystery, I shall never ask him to perform another miracle.

But that the whole matter of apostolic succession is a mere figment, and a very absurd one, will, I hope, appear from what follows :— In the first place, the apostles themselves never laid any stress upon it ; and never so much as mentioned it as a mark of the true church. Paul in his epistles to both Timothy and Titus, gives a very particular description of the qualifications necessary for bishops and deacons ; but he says not a word of the necessity of their apostolical succession ; — that is, that they should be ordained by the apostles or by men who had received ordination at second or third hand from the apostles ; much less from the thousandth hand, as it must be now, or at some period of the world, if such a thing were necessary. Nay, supposing a man to have received ordination from all the twelve apostles together, if this man should afterwards have departed from the faith, his ordination would have availed nothing to himself, and he would have possessed nothing that he could convey to another man. I am not speaking against the necessity of regular and proper ordination to the Christian ministry ; but what I meen is, that all that is valuable in it, to any individual or church over which he may be placed, is connected with his holding the truth as it is in Jesus. Distinct from this truth he has nothing in himself that can be useful in a spiritual sense ; and he has nothing that he can communicate to others by the imposition of his hands.

There was one man who received apostolical ordination to the deacon's office, who, if ancient ecclesiastical writers say the truth, became the head of an immoral sect, which is condemned in the strongest terms by Christ himself. This was Nicolas, one of the seven, mentioned, Acts vi. 5. who is said to have been the leader of the sect of the Nicolaitanes, see Rev. ii. 6. I confess I have seen nothing that fully convinces me that this sect took its name from the same Nicolas ; or, supposing that certain wicked men assumed his name, I have seen nothing that convinces me that he was the author of their heresy. Wicked men in all ages have chosen to call themselves by respectable names ; and the most wicked of all sects have had the impiety to call themselves by that name at which, it is said, every knee shall bow. But Papists, who believe in tradition, have no right to take advantage of my doubts. They, I suppose, believe most firmly that Nicolas the deacon was the father of the Nicolaitanes. Do they then believe, that after these heretics had departed from the faith of Christ so far as to incur this condemnation ;—"This thou hast that thou hatest the deeds of the Nicolaitanes, which I also hate :" Again :—"So hast thou them who hold the doctrine of the Nicolaitanes, which thing I hate :"—Do they, I say, believe that after Nicolas had become such an apostate, his apostolical ordination was of any use to him ; or that he had still the power of conferring orders upon others ? Can one confer upon another the power of preaching sound doctrine from which he himself has departed ? or can the apostolic ordination of a man to preach the truth empower that man to ordain others to preach falsehood and error ? I presume that even Dr Milner will not answer this question in the affirmative ; and if he cannot, he must allow the whole mystery of apostolic succession to go for nothing.

I am aware that deacons are not understood to have the power of ordaining ; but Dr Milner knows that many bishops embraced heresy at an early period, to whom what I have said of Nicolas applies. If they had apostolical ordination, it was ordination to teach and defend the truth ; and it imparted no power to ordain others for an opposite purpose. So far from laying any stress upon apostolical ordination, the apostle Paul, who received his commission from Christ, declares that even this divine ordination would become void, if he departed from the faith, and became a preacher of error :—"Though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed," Gal. i. 8. The Church of Rome, therefore, like every other church, must be tried by her doctrine, and the lives of her members, not by the apostolic succession of her clergy.

But, secondly, we have a plain rule laid down, by which we are to recognise true Christian teachers; and in this rule there is not a word about apostolical succession. "Many deceivers are entered into the world, who confess not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh. This is a deceiver and an antichrist. Look to yourselves, that we lose not those things which we have wrought, but that we receive a full reward. Whosoever transgresseth and abideth not in the doctrine of Christ, hath not God: he that abideth in the doctrine of Christ, he hath both the Father and the Son. If there come any unto you, and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, neither bid him God speed; for he that biddeth him God speed is partaker of his evil deeds;" 2 John 7—11. Here then the question is not whether a professed teacher of Christianity has regular ordination, and apostolical succession, but what doctrine does he bring? Again:—"Believe not every spirit, but try the spirits whether they are of God; because many false prophets are gone out into the world. Hereby know ye the Spirit of God: every spirit that confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is of God; and every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is not of God: and this is that Spirit of antichrist whereof ye have heard that it should come; and even now already it is in the world;" 1 John iv. 1—3. Here Christians are called to occupy the high ground of judges of what men, professing to be teachers, say to them. A Popish priest tells his people,—"The word of God which I announce to you, and the holy sacraments which I dispense to you, I am qualified to announce and dispense by such a Catholic bishop, who was consecrated by such another Catholic bishop," &c. Thus he assumes an air of authority, which sets the judgment of the people completely at defiance. He comes to them as their lord and master, and he treats them as his slaves; but the really Christian teacher comes as a servant to his fellow-creatures:—"We preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord, and ourselves your servants for Jesus' sake;" and every such faithful preacher desires to find his Christian brethren an intelligent people, and able to bring his preaching to the test of the divine record. This would never do in the Church of Rome. Her members must receive every thing upon the authority of the priests, who have received a certain mysterious communication from the apostles, to teach what no man has a right to try, as the apostle John commanded to try the spirits; from which it is evident that Papists are not the sort of persons whom the apostle addressed. In all his address there is no account made of apostolical succession. The spirits, that is, the teachers, might have this, or they might not; the thing which all who listened to their teaching were called to judge of, was the doctrine which they taught.

This was summarily comprehended in the question, whether or not Jesus Christ was come in the flesh? Those who denied this were the antichrist of the day. But such a general proposition must be taken as including all that it necessarily implies. Thus, when Christ himself was on earth, the great question was, whether he was the Christ or not? Those who believed the affirmative, submitted to him as the Christ and the Saviour of the world; and this implied the recognition of him in his whole character, as set forth in the scriptures. In like manner, the acknowledgment that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh implies his pre-existence; for who would say of a mere creature born into the world, he is come in the flesh? And it implies an acknowledgment of the design and purpose of his coming into the world; that is, to make an atonement, or put away sin by the sacrifice of himself. Now, the antichrist whom the apostle John describes was one who denied these things; and whether this was Arius, a mere Presbyter, who denied the divinity and atonement of Christ, and his host of followers; or the bishops of Rome, who, while professing to believe in the divinity and atonement of Christ, equally subverted the truth with regard to both, by raising mere creatures to the rank of intercessors and objects of divine worship; and by teaching the necessity of the sacrifice of the mass, to give efficacy to Christ's sacrifice,—the antichrist is equally manifest: and had it been possible for apostles themselves to have brought such doctrine they would have been justly rejected; how much more a host of immoral and heretical priests, who rest their claim to ecclesiastical authority upon a pretended descent in a right line from the apostles.

I grant that the apostle John's antichrist seems at first view to have more of the Socinian than the Popish character. It is a denying, or not having the Father and the Son; that is, not acknowledging the Christian doctrine of Him who sent, and of Him who was sent into the world. But as I have shown, the two systems unite in effecting the same thing, only the Popish method is less open and direct than the Socinian. Christ either made satisfaction, or atonement for sin, or he did not. The Socinian says at once, that he did not; the Papist says that he did; but then he immediately unsays this, by teaching that every man must yet satisfy divine justice for himself, less or more; and that the mass is a propitiatory sacrifice for sin; which implies as plainly as a thing can be expressed by implication, that Christ's sacrifice was not sufficient; and therefore did not make atonement for sin. Besides, to say that the work which Christ finished on the cross is imperfect, which it must be if it require the addition of any human work, or any sacrifice by human hands, is to deny that Christ is God, for all God's works are perfect. Thus Popery is the very antichrist that denies the Lord who redeemed his church by his own blood.

No. CCIII.

SATURDAY, JUNE 1ST, 1822.

I BEGIN to feel, as I believe many of my readers have felt for some weeks, that it is time to have done with Dr Milner. I have touched upon the most prominent parts of his work; and have even descended to notice some of its trifling and subordinate parts; and there is just one thing more in his second part which I think worthy of particular notice. Suspecting, I suppose, that his arguments would fail to convince the reason of his readers, that the Church of Rome is an apostolical church, he has made an attempt, by means of a copperplate, to satisfy their eyes, that she is at least a most flourishing church. He gives us a figure of her under what he calls, "The Apostolical Tree;" and a most noble tree it is; but it reminds me of some rhymes which children at school are accustomed to repeat over the figure of the Glasgow arms, which they have in the front of their catechisms;—"This is the tree that never grew," &c.

The following is the title of this sublimographic representation:—"THE APOSTOLICAL TREE, showing the Uninterrupted Succession of the Catholic Church from the apostles of Jesus Christ down to the present time; likewise the chief Heretics and Schismatics, who have in different ages been cut off from her communion." Over the root is inscribed these words, "I am the Vine," &c. This is surmounted by a naked human figure, meant to represent the Saviour as crucified,—his hands nailed to two branches, and his feet nailed together to the trunk, having under them a bunch of rich grapes. The first living branch on the right hand of the figure is the blessed Virgin; then comes St Joseph; then the holy Innocents. The first branch on the left hand is Jerusalem and Syria, then St Mary Magdalene, then St John the Baptist; but why he is brought in so late is not explained. The branches as we ascend are marked by the names of apostles, evangelists, and minor saints; and of nations which were converted to the faith, at the periods indicated by the insertion of the branches into the trunk, like the degrees of latitude in the margin of a map. Thus every century is marked on the trunk of the tree, up to the beginning of the nineteenth, where Pius VIIth stands at a very giddy height, and in much more danger of a fall than St Peter, who stands at the bottom of the list immediately over the head of the crucified figure, on which he might seem to press with all the weight which his name signifies, but for a bunch of grapes which intervenes. The trunk itself is one of the greatest natural curiosities (if it were natural) that ever was seen; for though it is of amazing height, there is no tapering in it. The diameter of the top is as great as that near the bottom; but what is perhaps still more singular,—on each side there are many branches which have been lopped off, and which are supended in mid air. These have all names of great notoriety;—the first on the right is Ebion; on the left, Simon Magus; and of the later ones, at the top, we have on the one hand, Wesley, Whitefield, Swedenborg, and Lebon; and on the other, Rousseau, Voltaire, Zinzendorf, Brienne, Robespierre, and Condorcet: and in defiance of the principle of gravitation, while they seem to be falling from an immense height, they have all their points, or light leafy parts towards the earth, and their solid heavy timber towards the sky; which, I suppose, Dr Milner has done on purpose, in order to show that heretics are such rebels against all law, that they will not submit even to the law of gravity; and thus they are more hardened than the very stones.

Above the tree there is a view of what is meant for heaven. In the centre there is a triangle, within which is the sacred name in Hebrew characters, and around it there are rays of glory. This is meant to represent the trinity. On both sides there are companies of priests and nuns in their canonical robes, looking towards the triangle. The foremost on one side seems to be the Pope, who has a small figure of the cross stuck into his skull, like a pin in a pincushion; and his hands are half lifted, and stretched out, as if he were warming his fingers at the bright rays which surround the figure in the centre. Above are little figures twittering like so many sparrows, which, I suppose, are meant for angels.

It is impossible to treat such a picture with seriousness, and yet it is not a proper subject of ridicule. Though there was nothing else objectionable in Dr Milner's work, this would convict him, and all who believe in him, of gross and abominable idolatry; nay, of representing heaven itself as an idol's temple; for there he exhibits the church triumphant as worshipping a material figure of three equal sides. This is an image of the Deity which Dr Milner sets up to be adored, which is idolatry of a much grosser kind than that of the ancient heathen who worshipped the sun, moon, and stars; for these are the God's work, and they display his glory; while Dr Milner teaches men to worship an image drawn by his own pen, or by the stylus of the engraver. The worship of reptiles, of which some heathens are guilty, degrading as it is, is more noble than this; for there is more of God in any thing that has life, than there is in the greatest works of man. I cannot allow myself to believe that Dr Milner seriously thinks the Deity is like a triangle; and therefore I suspect he has introduced the figure to serve the cause of his friends the Socinians; for, independently of the horrible impiety of forming any visible representation of the Divine Being, which He has most peremptorily forbidden, the Socinians could not desire a greater concession on the subject of the trinity than the use of such an image, even for illustration; for as one side is not a triangle, if the Deity were like this, no one of the sacred three in whose name we are baptized, would be God; and thus Popery and Socinianism combine to lead men to atheism, which is indeed the natural tendency of every system by which Deity is degraded to the rank of a creature, or by which an image of him is formed either by the hand or by the mind of man.

Dr Milner, however, appears to be quite serious in his graphic representation of the church in both earth and heaven. Of the latter indeed he says little or nothing but what appears in the picture; but of the former, that is, the church on earth, he thus boasts:— "Again you behold, in this tree, the continuation of the apostolical work, the conversion of nations; which, as it was committed by Christ to the Catholic church, so it has never been blessed by him with success in any hand but hers. This exclusive miracle, in the order of grace, like those in the order of nature, which I treated of in a former letter, is itself a divine attestation on her behalf." Letter XXIX. p. 137. It is scarcely worth while to inquire what he means by miracles "in the order of nature;" for all who understand the meaning of the words know, that things in the order of nature, that is, things natural, however strange and surprising, are quite different from things miraculous; but it is one great vice prevalent among Popish writers, that their language wants precision; and they use words in so vague a manner, that they can easily be made to mean any thing, or nothing, as may suit the purpose of the writers or their friends at a subsequent period, when they are called to account for what has been written by them.

But if any meaning can be attached to the above extract, I take it to be, that Christ has never honoured any but the Church of Rome to be instrumental in converting nations to the Christian faith; and that when she is honoured to perform this work, it is a miraculous "attestation on her behalf;" and I am by no means disposed to deny, that if so corrupt a church were to convert a nation, or even an individual to the holy faith of the gospel, it would look like a miracle. Such a miracle, I believe, has not been performed within her pale for a thousand years. I do not deny that many individuals in her communion may have been converted within this period; not by means of her influence and authority as a church, but because she had always some who had access to the word of God, and who thence, in spite of the malign influence of the church, received the truth to the salvation of their own souls.

Conversion is a strange wholesale sort of work in the opinion of Dr Milner; and in his apostolical tree he gives a large branch here and there, showing when, and under what Pope, such and such nations were converted; and in many instances their conversion turns out to be the same thing as their subjugation by the sword of an invading enemy. Such was the conversion of the Indians in South America by the Spanish missionaries, who accompanied the barbarous hordes of ruffians who invaded and conquered that effeminate people. They were mercifully allowed the alternative of worshipping the crucifix or being put to death; and though savages, they must have been convinced in their own consciences, that it was more noble to worship the sun than two cross sticks, yet we cannot imagine that many of them had the hardihood to stand out long against such pointed and solid arguments as bayonets and bullets. It was no wonder then that they became converts to the faith of Rome; but the consequence was, that they had only exchanged idols, and continued heathens under the name of Christian. The same remark applies to the many thousands whom St Francis Xavier and other missionaries are said to have converted in the East; though I do not say that similar violence was usually practised by them, though the Portuguese are blamed for converting men there at the point of the sword. The arts of deception were enough to produce all the effects that are reported to have taken place in these quarters, under the direction of Jesuit missionaries, among another simple and effeminate race of men, of whom nothing was required but to submit to the sprinkling of a little water, and conformity to a few other rites equally easy and inoffensive, while they were not required to forsake sin, or to have their affections in the least changed from sin to holiness. I recollect having read somewhere of St Austin of Canterbury, or of one of his companions, to whom such crowds of our Saxon ancestors came for baptism, at one time, that, finding it impossible to baptize them all individually, he consecrated all the water in a river, and took an instrument such as bleachers use to throw water over a field covered with linen, and thus he made the whole multitude converts by throwing the water among them. I do not vouch for the literal truth of this story; for I do not recollect where I read it, or on whose authority it is related. But it exhibits a fair specimen of the manner of making converts by Popish missionaries; and the tens of thousands whom Dr

Milner boasts of as having been baptized, in the East Indies and China, by certain missionaries, in a short space of time, can be accounted for only in some such way as this; for allowing that they were all baptized one by one, the missionary could have no more knowledge of their personal characters, than if he had baptized them by thousands at a time, by water thrown from a fire engine.

This, however, is what Dr Milner means by conversion. It is to get men to submit to the external rite of baptism by missionaries who have apostolical succession; and when such missionaries follow in the train of conquering armies, nations are easily converted. Thus the Vandals received Christianity, such as was presented to them, at the point of the sword, from the Teutonic knights of Charlemagne. "Thus Clovis and his Franks, Rollo and his Normans, were converted in a day, not from Satan to God, but from barefaced paganism to paganized Christianity." Of nothing greater than this has Rome to boast; and yet Dr Milner does boast of it, as a work which Christ has never blessed in the hands of any but Romish apostolical missionaries. But this is an achievement for which no Protestant—no real Christian—will envy them. It is such a process of conversion as Christ never approved; and the consequence is, that such converts are made more the children of the devil than they were before. The humble Christian missionary who is honoured to be the instrument of converting one soul to God, though he did no more in his whole life, has more blessings upon his labour, than if he had converted the empire of China to Popery, or to merely nominal Christianity under any name; and though Dr Milner treats with great derision and contempt the Moravians, Methodists, Baptists, and other Protestant missionaries, I have no doubt some of them will be honoured at the great day with, "Well done, good and faithful servant; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord," when those who have deceived the nations by false miracles and a spurious Christianity will be covered with shame and everlasting contempt.

The third part of Dr Milner's work consists of a formal defence of those articles of the Creed of Rome, by which she is chiefly distinguished from other churches; or rather, those articles which the Reformers rejected and condemned. These are,—the Invocation of Saints and Angels; the Worshipping of Relics, or what he calls Religious Memorials. He concludes his defence of this in the following words: "It is a point agreed upon among Catholic doctors and divines, that the memorials of religion (i. e. images and relics) form no essential part of it. Hence if you should become a Catholic, as I pray God you may, I will never ask you, if you have a pious picture or relic, or so much as a crucifix in your possession: but then I trust, after the declarations I have made, that you will not account me an idolater, should you see such things in my oratory or study, or should you observe how tenacious I am of my crucifix in particular. Your faith and devotion may not stand in need of such memorials; but mine, alas! do. I am too apt to forget what my Saviour has done and suffered for me; but the sight of his representation often brings this to my memory, and affects my sentiments. Hence I would rather part with most of the books in my library, than with the figure of my crucified Lord." Letter XXXIV. p. 33. This is a plain acknowledgment that his notions of Deity do not rise above material objects; for if he cannot remember his Saviour without an image of him, though his human nature was an object of sense, he cannot at all think of God who is a Spirit, without a visible representation of him. Thus he practises and teaches that very idolatry which is condemned throughout the whole Bible, and which it was the design of God by a revelation of himself to banish from the earth.

The other articles which Dr Milner defends in this part of his work are Transubstantiation, in all the grossness of it;—Communion under one kind, that is, withholding the cup from the laity;—the Sacrifice of the Mass;—Absolution from Sin;— Indulgence;— Purgatory;— Extreme Unction;—the Papal Supremacy, along with which he attempts to prove that the Pope is not Antichrist;—and a defence of his church against various misrepresentations, particularly of her persecuting spirit. On all these subjects I have written enough, particularly in my replies to the Catholic Vindicator, who, in his labours, drew largely upon this work of his great patron; so that if I were to reply to Dr Milner on the above points, I would be necessarily taken over ground which I have already occupied, and from which I have completely driven the enemy; for not one of our Papists has ventured to renew the attack, or even to stand on the defensive, since their hired champion was silenced, two years and a half ago: and I suspect Dr Milner himself will not condescend to enter the lists with a layman. This I know is the pretext of another clergyman for declining to defend his church against THE PROTESTANT; but this is all hollow Jesuitical shuffling; for as Papists profess to believe that Protestant ordination is null and void, I am no more a layman in their opinion than the Archbishop of Canterbury.

Before concluding I shall indulge the reader with a few sentences from Dr Milner's Letter on Supremacy:—"It is not, then, the faith of this church, that the Pope has any civil or temporal sovereignty, by virtue of which he can depose princes, or take away the property of other persons, out of his own domain: for even the incarnate Son of God, from whom he derives the supremacy which he possesses, did not claim, here upon earth, any right of the above-mentioned kind: on the contrary he positively declared, that his kingdom is not of this world! Hence, the Catholics of both our islands have, without impeachment even from Rome, denied upon oath that the Pope has any civil jurisdiction, power, superiority, or pre-eminence, directly or indirectly, within this realm. But, as it is undeniable, that different Popes, in former ages, have pronounced sentence of deposition against certain cotemporary princes, and, as great numbers of theologians have held (though not as a matter of faith) that they had a right to do so, it seems proper, by way of mitigating the odium which Dr Porteus and other Protestants raise against them, on this head, to state the grounds on which the pontiffs acted, and the divines reasoned in this business. Heretofore, the kingdoms, principalities, and states, composing the Latin church, when they were all of the same religion, formed, as it were, one Christian republic, of which the Pope was the accredited head. Now, as mankind have been sensible at all times, that the duty of civil allegiance and submission cannot extend beyond a certain point, and that they ought not to surrender their property, lives, and morality, to be sported with by a Nero or a Heliogabalus; instead of deciding the nice point for themselves, when resistance becomes lawful, they thought it right to be guided by their chief pastor." Letter XLVI. p. 131. Here Dr Milner admits that an odium attaches to the Papal administration; and that so far from being able to remove, he can only mitigate it. And his mitigation consists in admitting the fact, that the Pope exercised authority over all Christian states; and that for the express purpose "of deciding the nice point," when subjects should rebel against their sovereigns. And this must always have been when the thing was agreeable to the Pope himself, and when sovereigns refused to be subject to him; as in the case of king John, and Henry VIII. and queen Elizabeth. It is true Dr Milner confines his admission to the case of such sovereigns as Nero and Heliogabalus; but he has no right to do so, for the Pope is the sole judge; and Dr Milner knows, that in the esteem of the Pope a heretical prince is infinitely more hateful than a Nero. Whenever therefore Papists shall become powerful enough, for the purpose, in this kingdom, the Pope will "decide the nice point," when they shall throw off a Protestant and bring in a Popish sovereign. A sentence or two farther on, indeed, Dr Milner tells us, that "Since Christendom has been disturbed by a variety of religions, this power of the pontiff has been generally withdrawn." This is to quiet our fears in the mean time; for it was never fully withdrawn; and this power was never disclaimed by the Pope himself, so that we may expect he will resume the exercise of it whenever an occasion offers.

The reader will readily perceive a striking contrast between the Pope, even according to Dr Milner's partial representation of him, and the apostle Peter from whom he pretends to derive his authority. It was in the reign of Nero and such as he that Peter and Paul commanded every soul to be subject to the higher powers; and to pray for kings and all in authority: but the Pope sets himself above all sovereigns, and makes it his business to "decide the nice point," when subjects shall no longer obey, but rebel!

Yet it seems it is not the faith of the church that the Pope possesses temporal sovereignty, because Jesus Christ did not claim this when on earth. Does Dr Milner then really believe, or wish us to believe, that the conduct and claims of the Pope are regulated by those of Jesus Christ? His words imply no less than this impudent mockery of his readers, whom he must take to be no better than beasts of burden, else he would not venture to insult them by insinuating such a palpable falsehood, —a falsehood detected by his own words in the same paragaph. Christ declined being a judge or a divider among men, in their temporal affairs; but according to Dr Milner's own account, the Pope was the accredited head of kingdoms; and that "the kings and princes themselves acknowledged this right in the Pope, and frequently applied to him to make use of his indirect temporal power, as appears in numerous instances."

Dr Milner has another quibble, in the words of the oath, which, he says, Papists in this country swear; that is, that the Pope has not any civil jurisdiction, power, &c. within this realm. We know very well that he has not, and we do not require to be informed of the fact by them. But whom are we to thank for this? Our noble ancestors, who threw off the yoke, which their degenerate children are labouring to rivet on again. Papists will not swear that the Pope ought not to have any civil authority in this kingdom; and if they did, no man would believe them in earnest.

No. CCIV.

SATURDAY, JUNE 8TH, 1822.

DR MILNER, like most other Popish writers, repeats the silly boast of the Duke of Brunswick, that many Protestants, in the prospect of death, seek to be reconciled to the Church of Rome; but that he never knew an instance of a Papist, in these circumstances, desiring to die a Protestant. I do not know whether this is true or not; but supposing it to be true, it proves nothing in favour of Popery, which, like every other system, ought to rest upon its own merits, and not upon what either dying or living men think of it. Both may be under a great delusion; and that multitudes both living and dying are so, is too evident to admit of reasonable doubt. A deceived heart has turned men aside from the love of God and obedience to him; and when they receive not the love of the truth that they may be saved, but have pleasure in unrighteousness, he sends them strong delusion; that is, he leaves them to the influence of those errors and vices which they have chosen, and from which they refuse to be reclaimed. This delusion consists in their believing a lie, which was the cause of the fall and ruin of our whole race; and which is now the cause, and the sole cause, why all those to whom the gospel comes are not saved by it; for their believing a lie is stated as the same thing as their not believing the truth, or not receiving the love of the truth that they might be saved; 2 Thess. ii. 10—12. The condemnation of such is represented as proceeding upon this ground alone; because their not receiving the truth, is a positive rejection of that salvation which God in infinite mercy provided for our fallen race; and those who will not accept of deliverance from the guilt and punishment of their sins in this way, shall never find another way. Thus, in strong and decisive language, Christ himself declares the truth of the case: "For God sent his Son into the world, not to condemn the world; but that the world through him might be saved." But Christ never proposed to save any man against his will, or any man who continued to dishonour God by disbelieving the word of his Son. Therefore, he continues,—"He that believeth on him is not condemned; but he that believeth not is condemned already, because he hath not believed in the name of the only begotten Son of God. And this is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men have loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil;" John iii. 17—19. Their loving darkness rather than light, is the same thing as their preferring the devil's lie to God's truth; and the reason is, the lie allows them to live in sin, while the truth would turn them from it. Their deeds are evil;—they have pleasure in unrighteousness;—therefore, they hate the truth that is holy in its nature, and which produces holiness in all that embrace it.

It is the devil's old and original lie by which he still deceives the world, for it is doubtful if he could ever make another equal to it, and while he gets the world to continue to believe it, there is scarcely another necessary for his purpose. It was, though you disobey God, ye shall not surely die: and it is now, though you live in sin, ye shall not surely die;—that is, ye shall not perish for ever;—by some means or other, you shall escape condemnation; and if you cannot find a way of escape for yourself, the church will do it for you;—the priest will absolve you at the hour of death;—and though you should go to purgatory for a time, he will, for a stipulated price, insure your ultimate and safe arrival in heaven. This, I confess, has the appearance of placing the subject in a light horribly ludicrous. But it is horribly true. There is nothing exaggerated in this view of the character of Popery; and not one feature of the picture distorted.

In his concluding letter, Dr Milner introduces some great Protestant names, as admitting "that salvation may be found in the communion of the original Catholic Church: but no divine of this church," says he, "consistently with her characteristical unity, and the constant doctrine of the holy fathers and of scripture itself, as I have elsewhere demonstrated, can allow that salvation is to be found out of this communion; except in the case of invincible ignorance," p. 197. I never knew before that salvation was to be found any where by invincible ignorance. This, I believe, is the highest commendation of ignorance that ever was penned, for the advantage of possessing it must be immense, seeing it is the only faculty by which salvation can be found, without submitting to the intolerable bondage of Rome! Who would ever desire to acquire knowledge after this?

But my design in quoting this passage is to show how the Church of Rome glories in that which ought to be her shame; that is, her stern, exclusive, sectarian spirit. It is to her narrow pale that Dr Milner applies the words "original Catholic Church;" though he knows that Protestant divines attach a very different meaning to the words. But admitting them in his sense, few Protestants, I suppose, will deny the possibility of salvation to men in communion with the Church of Rome. For my part, I believe that salvation is not only possible but certain to every man in that and every other church, who believes in Christ and turns from sin to holiness; and I doubt not this has taken place in numerous instances, by means of some part of the word of God, read or heard by individuals in communion with the Church of Rome, notwithstanding the monstrous corruption of that church, and her extensively organized opposition to the truth. The Lord knoweth them that are his every where, and as he preserved a few Jews in Babylon from the rage of their enemies, so he can preserve alive the souls that trust in him even in Antichristian Babylon. The very command,—"Come out of her, my people,"—which is as much in force as ever, implies that some of the Lord's people may still be in her, and that they are where they ought not to be. Such persons are saved, not because they are in the Church of Rome, but in spite of it, through the abounding mercy of our God and Saviour.

But, instead of imitating the Christian charity of Protestants, who believe that persons in the Church of Rome may be saved, Dr Milner, and I suppose all Papists, triumph in maintaining the principle that there is no possibility of being saved out of her communion, except in the case of invincible ignorance, which of itself makes salvation impossible; for ignorance cannot be called invincible till knowledge has been presented, and rejected; and then it incurs, on its own account, the condemnation of not receiving the truth.

But this exclusion from salvation of all who are out of the Church of Rome is not all, nor even the worst of the system. The more dangerous and destructive principle is, that all who are within that church shall certainly be saved, in virtue of their being there, and their participating of her rites, whatever may be their personal character. To teach that a man will be saved in virtue of his belonging to any church, without being personally united to Christ by faith, and renewed by his Spirit, is to encourage presumption and immorality. This was the error of the carnal Jews, who thought all was well because Abraham was their father, and they were of the stock of Israel, which was the true church at the time. But as Paul told them afterwards,—"He is not a Jew who is one outwardly" only; so he is not a Christian who is merely one outwardly; that is, who has no more than an external visible relation to a Christian church, though it were as holy as that of Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost. "Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God." This means a new creation to holiness by the Spirit of God, and a turning away from sin. But the Church of Rome teaches that being in her communion, and receiving her sacraments, makes salvation perfectly secure. Thus persons who will not forsake their sins are flattered with the delusive hope that they shall be saved: and supposing it to be true that many Protestants, in the prospect of death, seek to be reconciled to the Church of Rome, this is enough to account for it. Wherever the Protestant religion is established, or generally prevalent, there will be found many who assume the name, and pass for Protestants, who live very wicked lives; and in consequence, they feel themselves miserable in the prospect of death and judgment. If they would apply to Christ even in the last hour, he would not cast them out; but such persons have no distinct apprehension of the gospel plan of salvation; and what is worse, they have no heart to it. They will not submit to the righteousness of God, and embrace the truth which brings, as the free gift of infinite mercy, salvation from sin, as well as from its punishment. It is not salvation from sin that they want; they desire only exemption from punishment; and this is what the gospel does not promise, without salvation from sin itself; that is, without sanctification,—a new heart, and a new life. Such persons as I am speaking of cannot endure this; but their misery may be increasing; they turn away from the word of God, for they find it is all against them; but the Church of Rome presents a remedy which she assures them is of sovereign efficacy. It is—Be reconciled to the church. Her baptism will most certainly regenerate you. Her sacraments are effectual means of salvation. Her priests will absolve you from your sins. At the hour of death they will anoint you with holy oil; and give you a passport from this world to the next, which will make your salvation absolutely certain. The priests are so sure of this, that they pledge their own salvation upon it, as the Duke of Brunswick says they did to him, and promised to take his damnation on themselves, if he should be damned. See his Fifty Reasons, No. 50. Now it is by no means wonderful that persons who reject the salvation of the gospel, and who cannot part with their sins, should be left, in righteous judgment, to believe this lie. They lay hold of it, as drowning persons do of a straw. Thus their conscience is pacified. They attend to every prescribed form, and observe all the rites of the church, expecting that by these they shall be saved, while living in sin, with their hearts at enmity against God. The delusion is so fascinating, that, instead of being surprised that some carnally minded Protestants should embrace it, the surprise is that there are so few.

I shall illustrate these things by an example of recent occurrence, which shows how closely the priests lie in wait to get dying Protestants reconciled to the church, which they maintain insures their salvation, though so ill as to be unconscious of what is done. The statement which is given upon oath has been published in some of the Irish Newspapers.

The following are the affidavits which the Rev. Warden Daly has found it necessary to publish, in justification of his own character, which was so insidiously and grossly attacked; and to prove to the world of what description the spirit of modern Popery is.

County of the Town of Galway, to wit. } James Daly, of the town of Galway, clerk, maketh oath and saith, that he has been eleven years and upwards Warden of the Collegiate Church of St Nicholas, in said town; that during the whole of that time he has known Bartholomew Halliday to be a member of the established Church, and as long as he was able, a constant attendant at divine service, and the Supper of the Lord. That about three years ago the said Halliday received a hurt which confined him entirely to his room; that during the latter period he was regularly attended by deponent as a minister, and regularly received the sacrament at his own request, along with Thomas Blakely, a friend of his; that in many of these occasions he did repeatedly, impressively, and with considerable agitation, supplicate deponent to prevent him from being tormented in his dying moments by a Roman Catholic priest; that having been visited by deponent about ten days before his death, he said to deponent, "Oh Sir, I wish I was out of this place!" giving deponent to understand that he was surrounded with bigots, and would not be allowed to die in peace; that deponent pledged himself to protect him from any unwarrantable intrusion; that at ten o'clock in the night of Wednesday, the 6th instant, or Monday the 4th, (does not perfectly recollect which of the two,) deponent visited the said Halliday; that he found him so weak in intellect, being ninety years of age, and at the close of a long illness; that he scrupled to administer the sacrament to him until asked to do so by himself; that then and there deponent did administer to said Halliday the Lord's Supper, with the aforesaid Thomas Blakely; that in the morning of Friday, the 8th instant, a man of the name of John Reilly called at his house, and informed him by a message, that Bartholomew Halliday was just speechless and wished to have deponent with him when he was dying; that deponent gave some answer that he would call upon him; that he accordingly did so at half-past twelve o'clock; that he found him breathing with the utmost difficulty; that his eyes were closed; that he was reduced to the lowest state of imbecility, bodily and mental; that he was, in deponent's opinion, utterly and absolutely incapable of understanding, adopting, or satisfactorily assenting to any new profession of faith; that, in deponent's opinion, he was equally incapable of calling any person out of the next room; that deponent standing close to his bed, and asking if he wanted any thing, thought he heard him pronounce the word water; that deponent went accompanied by Halliday's grand-daughter, to the church; gave her some wine; desired her to give it mixed with water to her grandfather, and promised to return, and say over him the departing prayer of the Church of England; that deponent was just setting out to do so at about ten minutes past four o'clock, that he was met by a female parishioner of his who told him that the women of the house had sent for a priest for Bartholomew Halliday; and that when she heard them doing so, she came off for deponent; that deponent walked fast to Halliday's room; that he found a priest at Halliday's bed-side; that deponent paused at the door unseen by the priest; that he was not administering any of the rites of the Latin Church; that he heard him distinctly ask Halliday, "Do you choose to die a Catholic?" that before any answer could be given by his gasping parishioner deponent interfered; that he strongly remonstrated with the priest upon the impropriety of torturing an unoffending man, and leading the deluded people about him to suppose that the great work of conversion to God could take place under such circumstances; that the priest said he was sent for; that deponent flatly denied his being sent for by Halliday, and stooped down to speak to the dying man; that the priest pushed himself between them, exclaiming, "Ours is the ancient religion, we can absolve you from your sins," and other similar expressions; that it was in answer to them and such like expressions, only, that deponent frequently said, "Bartholomew Halliday, that's a lie;" that the priest did then prepare himself to administer Extreme Unction; that being under a promise to his helpless parishioner, and now his only protector, deponent felt himself called upon to prevent by every lawful means the torture so long and so justly apprehended; that he did break the bottle of water; that he did extinguish the candles; that he did fling himself on the bed, between the priest, and his parishioner (to prevent the anointing); that he was then laid hold of by some women; that his great-coat was torn; that he was forcibly dragged from the bed of his parishioner; that the impression upon the minds of these infatuated women seemed to deponent obviously to be, that whatever Halliday might be, till within a few hours of his death, that if the priest was in time to read his absolution over him, all would be well in an eternal world; and deponent is sorry to be obliged solemnly to swear that the priest did (more than once, after anointing Halliday) fully countenance this strong delusion, by exclaiming in the most positive manner, "He's a Catholic, and his soul is saved;" that deponent, while dragged by the women, snatched the priest's book, in which he was reading Latin, out of his hands; that he then challenged the priest if he was indeed a minister of God to kneel down without his book, and say one prayer in English, suited to the circumstances of the dying sinner; and that if he did so, deponent was satisfied to quit the room; that the priest was irritated at this proposal; that he began to rave against Luther and the Reformation; that he repeatedly called the Protestant religion a diabolical religion; that he told the deponent that he would crush him under his feet; that a woman of the name of Mary Cox entered the room; that seeing deponent's situation she ran for Mr James Forster; that when Mr James Forster came in deponent requested him to send for the Mayor; that the priest seeing two policemen enter, quitted deponent, and commenced an altercation with them; that deponent did then lean over his poor parishioner, saying, "Bartholomew Halliday, shall I pray with you?" that "Yes, Sir," was answered by him; that deponent knelt in prayer; that Halliday repeated after him the Lord's prayer, and a part of the confession; that the Mayor knocked at the door; that the priest began and continued for some time to justify his conduct; that deponent requested the Mayor to ask the dying man which clergyman he chose to have; that the Mayor, after some hesitation, stooped down and said to Halliday, "Do you choose to have Mr Daly the priest, or Warden Daly?" that Halliday, in deponent's hearing, answered, "Warden Daly;" and that the Mayor acknowledged that he did. Warden Ffrench, the Roman Catholic Warden, being in the room, the priest complained loudly, that deponent had called him a liar; that deponent said to him in Warden Ffrench's presence, that he was obliged by his principles to declare, that every man who inculcated religious falsehood was a liar, and under the influence of the father of lies; and that it was in that sense only that he ever made use of the expression; that Warden Ffrench seemed satisfied with the explanation; that the sheriff now entered the room, and a new altercation commenced; that during the altercation that deponent sat upon Halliday's bed, and repeated to him passages of scripture; that Warden Ffrench and the sheriff now advanced to ask him which clergyman he choose to have; that deponent did then retire from Halliday's bed-side to make room for Warden Ffrench and the sheriff; that the sheriff asked Halliday, "Do you choose the minister or the priest?" that in answer to this question, deponent's poor parishioner gave utterance to a sound which was partly an articulation of the tongue, and partly a rattle of the throat; that the sheriff and the persons near the bed exclaimed, "He says the minister;" that Warden Ffrench protested he did not hear it; that the sheriff again asked the same question; that Halliday uttered the same heart-sickening kind of sound; that the sheriff and the persons about him cried out, "Now he says the priest;" that Halliday's grand-daughter now came in; that she appeared surprised at what happened; that she went up to her grandfather's bed, and asked him who he would have; that she says he answered, "Warden Daly, Warden Daly;" that deponent, disgusted at the uproar and confusion about him, and at the cruel treatment of his parishioner, requested Mr Forster to kneel down with him in prayer; that they knelt close to Halliday; that as soon as deponent opened his lips, Halliday followed him and said a distinct "Amen," to deponent's petitions; that deponent called upon Mr Forster to observe him; that Mr Forster said he did observe him; that when the priest heard deponent say, "We have erred and strayed from thy ways like lost sheep," he loudly interrupted him, saying, "Indeed you have erred and strayed, and grossly;" that the priest then began to read out of his book in a strong voice; that after some time thus spent the Mayor said that he thought both clergymen ought to leave the room; that the priest stopped and consented to do so; that deponent did so too after putting up a prayer, (for his own sake and the sake of those around him) that the Lord would be pleased to kill and crucify in his own way, any angry or wrong feeling that might arise out of the scene that had occurred; that before deponent got off his knees, Warden Ffrench said that he and the priest ought to shake hands; that deponent said, "Oh! surely I will kiss his hand, to show him I have no personal animosity to him;" that deponent having done so, rose and quitted the room, (about seven o'clock in the afternoon:) deponent does solemnly swear, that he did not call the Roman Catholic religion mummery, nor speak disrespectful of its ministers in general; that it was only the horrid and deluding scene then and there exhibited, that he called, and always will call, mummery; and that it was the conduct of the unhappy persons concerned in it that he loudly, and as he conceives, justly, reproached.

JAMES DALY.

Sworn before me in the Tholsel of Galway, this 25th day of March, 1822.

JAMES O'HARA, Jun. Recorder.

[Then follow several other affidavits confirming the above statement.]

No. CCV.

SATURDAY, JUNE 15TH, 1822.

My last Number contained an account of a fracas, or rather a pitched battle, which took place in Ireland, in March last, between two priests, the one a Protestant, the other a Papist, occasioned by a dispute whether an old man should be suffered to die, as he had lived, a Protestant, or whether he should be converted to Popery? In this battle, as in every other, much damage was sustained on both sides. The Protestant had his great-coat torn, and the Papist's bottle-holder being a woman, he had his bottle broken, and his holy water spilled on the ground; and, as has happened with many engagements on a larger scale, it remains to this day uncertain which party gained the victory; for instead of being claimed by both parties, as is often the case in the wars of nations, it is not claimed by either; and both retired from the field covered with shame.* The narrative in my last Number is given in the form of an affidavit by the Protestant clergyman; and it is confirmed by several other affidavits, which I do not think it necessary to insert.

* Since the above was written I have met with a gentleman who is acquainted with the Protestant clergyman, Mr Daly. He is a highly respectable and amiable person; and what appears reprehensible in his conduct, was occasioned by the strong provocation of seeing his dying parishioner exposed to the torture from which he had promised to protect him.

Peter Daly the Popish priest, has not, so far as I have seen, published any account of the affair in his own name. But there is a letter by him in the Warder, Dublin Newspaper, of March 30, in which he complains grievously of the misrepresentations of the other party. He says,—"The principles of Catholicity are a sufficient refutation of the assertion, that I forced my attendance on the unwilling individual. According to the doctrine of my church, sacred things are not to be administered except to those who are willing and well-disposed; and it betrays an ignorance of the sacred responsibilities of the priesthood, to suppose that a Catholic clergyman would desert his duty, even with the risk of his life." He publishes along with this letter six affidavits, which do not materially contradict those on the Protestant side, farther than that John Reilly swears that the dying man desired him to bring "a Catholic priest." At the same time the deponent says, when Halliday first spoke of his bringing a priest, he thought he "was raving or delirious;" and "asked him two or three times, whether it was a Protestant or a Catholic clergyman he wished to have?" In this condition it is very evident that the dying man was not capable of giving a distinct answer to the question, or conscious of what he was saying; and allowing that his tongue unconsciously expressed the words "Catholic priest," this could have no weight with any rational man, when it was opposed by the whole tenor of a life of ninety years, during which he professed a firm adherence to the Protestant religion, and an abhorrence of Popery; yet this is all the foundation that this priest had, according to the oath of his own witness, for considering the dying man "willing and well-disposed" to the rites of his church.

An affidavit is given on the same side by the Popish Warden Ffrench, in which he swears as follows;—"Some doubts having arisen as to the religion of said Halliday; and he and the said mayor were deputed to ask the said Halliday what clergyman he wished to have, when said Halliday distinctly declared he wished to have the priest; upon which it was acknowledged and acquiesced in by the said mayor, that Halliday had called for 'a priest.'" This is the only farther evidence of the poor man's being "willing and well-disposed" to be converted to Popery; and every one acquainted with the nature of evidence must see, that here there is no evidence at all. All that is sworn to by this witness is, that the dying man wished to have the priest; but in the feeble state of his mind, this might designate the Protestant as well as the Popish clergyman; and what the mayor is said to have acknowledged is, that Halliday called merely for a priest. Mr Ffrench's affidavit, therefore, proves that Halliday did not call for the "Catholic" priest; for if he had, Ffrench would not have omitted to say so, seeing that was the very thing which his brother priest wished to prove by his testimony.

This priest adopts a truly Popish way of rebutting the accusation contained in the Protestant priest's affidavit:—"The principles of Catholicity are a sufficient refutation of the assertion, that I forced my attendance on the unwilling individual," &c. He wishes the world to believe that his personal conduct could not be wrong, because the principles of his church are right: as if a man accused of murder were to argue,—the divine law which I believe is a sufficient refutation of the charge, for it is written, "Thou shalt do no murder." It is not however worth while to dwell on this subject, considered merely as the improper conduct of an individual; and if this were the subject of discussion, we would have only to express our abhorrence, and have done with it. But it illustrates the system of Popery, which teaches that a man may live in sin, even in heresy, which is the greatest of all sins in Popish estimation, and continue in this state till his senses are so far gone that he cannot express a coherent sentiment, or even articulate an audible word; and yet by the mystic spell of holy water and holy oil, a priest can reconcile him to the church, and save his soul! The first thing that strikes one in reading such an account as that in my last Number, is the horrible barbarity of tormenting a poor dying man with their teasing entreaties to submit to those rites which he had abhorred during his whole life, and when he had not strength to resist, or so much as to protest against them. But this is little in comparison of the fiend-like malignity of deceiving men in health, by teaching them that, live as they will, the priests can save them in their last moments. This is the quintessence of Satanic imposture and delusion. My private correspondence from Ireland apprised me long ago, that the priests were constantly on the watch to ensnare dying Protestants in the manner described in the case of poor Halliday; but I did not expect to see such a public exhibition of it, of so recent a date as the spring of the present year; for the priests are as artful in concealing as in practising their works of darkness.* The above case, interesting and shocking as it is, will be little known, even in Ireland; for most of the Newspapers are in the Popish interest, and carefully guarded against the admission of any thing prejudicial to the cause. But for the Antidote and the Warder, two papers lately established in Dublin, for the purpose of upholding the constitution and Protestant interest, I should probably never have heard of the story, which was originally published in a remote provincial journal near the place where it happened.

* Since this Number was sent to the printer, I have received a letter from a respectable corresponent, containing a narrative of similar cruelty and imposition practised upon an old woman in the north of Scotland, who, in her dying moments, after resisting to the utmost of her feeble strength, had the sacrament forced down her throat. "This took place in Scotland," says my correspondent, "and was well known in the country round at the time; and it shows that the genius, the spirit, and the practice of Popery are the same wherever it has power."

The rage of the day—for every period has its particular rage—is "conciliation." It is a good word; but in all ages the worst things have been introduced under the best names; and thus they got possession of the human mind before their true nature was detected. Protestants, especially our Protestant legislature, have made many concessions to Papists, with a view to conciliate them, within the last fifty years. But they are at this day farther from the point they aimed at than ever they were. Papists have never conceded one iota to us; and they tell us plainly that they will not, and cannot concede any thing; for theirs is the ancient church, which was unjustly dispossessed of its power and property by Protestants; and all our concessions to them —all our attempts at conciliation—have only given them a standing ground to annoy us by demanding restoration of their lost power and possessions. This they are doing at this day most clamorously, and with the most virulent abuse of the English and their government; and while Protestants, in their simplicity, are dreaming that their attempts at conciliation will produce blessed effects in the next age, when their children will be regarded as brothers by the Papists of that day, the Popish priests in Ireland are sowing the seeds of more fell discord and deadly hostility against Protestants, than any thing else that the present age has witnessed, or that can easily enter into the mind of men of Christian temper and feeling.

The leading men among the Papists in Dublin, finding that, in the hands of the Hibernian and other societies, the work of education was proceeding with great success; and that the poor people would be taught to read the Bible in spite of the priests, have resolved to take the work of education in their own hands, and to furnish the children with such reading only as is agreeable to themselves. They have formed, says the editor of the Antidote, in his paper of 11th ult. an establishment which they call 'The Hibernian Education Society,' "for which they are making the most vigorous exertions to obtain parliamentary aid. When the public are informed that one of the standard books, introduced into the Roman Catholic schools, (we are justified in saying without any exception whatever,) is 'A SKETCH OF IRISH HISTORY, compiled by the Rev. Mr England, formerly parish priest of Brandon, and now R. C. bishop in Carolina, America—a work pregnant with treason and falsehood, and inculcating the most inveterate hatred to the British government—they will duly appreciate the claims of such schools to parliamentary support! The work in question is in our hands, and we feel it would be criminal in us to withhold it from a discriminating public. The greater part of it, indeed almost every page, shall therefore be submitted to our readers, who will be enabled thus to judge pretty clearly, what system of education the Roman Catholic hierarchy wish to promote. A few passages from this precious production must for the present serve as a specimen. What a hopeful method to render the rising generation loyal!!!"

"What was the conduct of the English toward the natives?

It was marked by every species of dissimulation, and oppression, that disgraces human nature; nor does it appear that they for some time pursued a different line of conduct. For from this period, a deluge of woes poured in upon Ireland; her subsequent annals are written in characters of blood, and are but the records of division and persecution.

Were any Irish Catholics put to death for their religion during her reign? (Elizabeth's.)

Yes, multitudes; but the names and history of only two hundred are upon record. The common stretching rack was frequently employed against the Catholic prisoners, and it was not unusual to tear the nails from their fingers, or to batter the shaven crowns of the clergy until their brains appeared.

Did James restore the Catholics to their birth-rights by a change of the act of settlement, commonly called the Black Act?

No; as this act had the sanction and experience of twenty years, he dreaded the inconvenience and disorder likely to result from such a general transfer of property.

Had not Ireland much heavier causes of complaint than the revolted colonies?

Infinitely greater. America had been founded and cherished by England; Ireland, on the contrary, by a long and various warfare, as well as by a perfidious policy, was subjugated, depressed, degraded, restricted in manufactures and commerce, exhausted by taxes, and drained by enormous remittances to England. The people could not but feel that they were ruled with an iron rod, not for their improvement or advantage, but for their impoverishment and oppression.

Did Mr Pitt lend the arm of the executive to all the purposes of intolerance, to which his Irish undertakers thought fit to apply it?

He did most largely. The weakening of Ireland by internal dissensions was the private order given to the chief agents, while the public instructions to the ostensible and responsible ministers of the crown, concealed the destructive principle in the back ground.

What do you mean by the Protestant ascendency?

An oligarchy who claimed exclusive possession of loyalty, and who, for the purpose of securing to themselves the places which they held and the patronage which they enjoyed, continually charged with disaffection to the government all persons who were desirous of conciliating the people, by extending to Ireland that portion of civil and religious liberty which is the best gift of the British constitution.

What were the principles of the Orangemen?

They affected to unite in support of the constitution as established by king William at the Revolution of 1688, and their original object and obligation are stated to have been the extermination of the Catholics of Ireland, as far as in them lay. This oath of extermination they afterwards changed into that of supporting the king, as long as he should support the Protestant ascendancy.

Did the united Irishmen take any improper steps in 1797?

Yes; they renewed their league with the French directory, and laid plans for the rebellion of 1798.

Did any occurrences tend to goad them on to this treasonable act?

Yes; the violent and unconstitutional outrages of the Orangemen, the unwarrantable and illegal excesses of a portion of the magistracy, and the half-hanging, tortures, floggings, and burnings, which, under the pretext of excessive loyalty, were permitted by the minister, and inflicted by his sycophants.

What was the result of the rebellion?

It deprived his majesty of 70,000 most useful subjects, whom wiser councils would have preserved to fight the battles of the British empire against its most potent enemy, and it laid the foundation for the legislative union.

Was any particular class of the Catholics especially deceived by the ministry on this occasion?

Yes; the ecclesiastical trustees of Maynooth college; ten unsuspecting prelates were cajoled by the ministry, particularly by Lord Castlereagh, with the expectation that emancipation would be granted and their religion protected.

Did not these prelates consent to have the power of a veto upon the appointment of bishops vested in the crown?

No; they indeed resolved that some degree of interference on the part of his majesty may be allowed, for the purpose of assuring him of the loyalty of the persons nominated to the vacant sees; but they did so without reflection or authority, and under the most deceitful circumstances, which rendered the resolution less censurable than it otherwise would have been: but even their fellow-prelates were ignorant of this fact for nearly nine years after.

What was the grand active principle upon which Lord Hardwick accepted the government of Ireland in 1802?

A principle he dared not openly avow—viz. to resist her emancipation, and to perpetuate the old system of division and exclusion, under the delusive semblance of a new system of conciliation and mildness.

Did the Catholics receive any concessions from government, during the administration of Mr Addington, now Lord Sidmouth?

No; this minister pledged himself to march in the steps of his predecessor; consequently, he deprecated the very thought of Catholic emancipation.

Did not many unequivocal proofs bespeak the determination of the Richmond administration to rivet Catholic Ireland in degradation and despondency?

Yes; a fostering countenance was particularly given to the Orangemen, that tended rather to foment and encourage, than to put down or punish, their atrocities.

Did not Orange ferocity sensibly increase in the year 1809?

It did. The native leaders of the Orange societies rendered their systems at that period so additionally ferocious, that some of the less blood-thirsty withdrew their names, who nevertheless adhered to the general principles of their institution: that is, to a proscriptive and implacable hatred to Catholicity."

The above is a short specimen of the sort of reading which the Papists in Ireland have introduced into their schools, and which they make to supersede lessons from the holy scriptures, which are not so much to their taste, and with which they think the children cannot be so safely intrusted. It would be easy to show from authentic history, that the above statements are grossly false, or shamefully distorted representations. But supposing every one of them literally true, what good end could be served by preoccupying the minds of all the children in Ireland with matters so hostile to their neighbours and fellow-subjects in England,—especially against the government? I believe that no other answer can be given than that the Papists wish to cherish and propagate a spirit of hostility and rebellion in the country, in the hope of ultimately overturning the Protestant establishment, of getting their own church established on its ruins, and recovering not only the property of the church, but also all the lay property that has been forfeited in successive rebellions since the time of Queen Elizabeth.

Much has been said and written about the misgovernment of Ireland; and it is very common for persons who do not generally complain of public measures, to admit, that with regard to Ireland nothing has been rightly managed. But I defy the wisest man in the world to say how it is possible to govern a people circumstanced as the Irish are, and have been for many centuries. Before government can do any thing for a people, they must be taught to do something for themselves; or, at least, to submit to what government is willing to do for them. But the great body of the people in Ireland acknowledge an authority superior to that of the supreme government of the kingdom. This is the authority of their priests, to which they implicitly subject themselves both in body and soul. Government cannot possibly get at them, but through the medium of the priests; and it has always been the study of these priests to neutralize, and render abortive every effort to enlighten the people, or to make their condition more comfortable, because this would tend to withdraw the people from under their ghostly authority.

People will not derive benefit from the very best endeavours of those whom they have been taught to hate. The Irish are taught from their infancy to regard with mortal hatred the people and the government of England. Formerly this hatred was instilled into their minds by oral tradition;—now it has become the subject of reading and instruction in their schools, as appears by the above extracts from their school book; and with astonishing impudence, they have applied, or are about to apply, to parliament, for a grant of money to enable them to carry on this instruction upon a more extensive scale! that is, to enable them more effectually to overturn the present establishment, which is the object which they are not ashamed to avow among themselves; for the truth of which I appeal to one of their own number, the Rev. Mr Morrissy, whose words are given in an early part of this volume. (See Nos. 171—174.) Though Solomon himself had the government of a people so perverted, enslaved, and besotted by ignorance and superstition, he would find it impossible to govern them either for their benefit, or to his own satisfaction.

That the people of England have no hostility towards those of Ireland, but rather regard them with a brotherly affection, is demonstrated by the efforts which they are making at this moment for the relief of the many thousands of them, almost all Papists, who are in a state of starvation, in the southern parts of that kingdom; and government has really done more for their subsistence than for that of any other part of the empire in the present age. The simple statement of this notorious fact ought to cover with shame the author and the distributers of that most seditious school catechism, which has occupied so much of the present Number; but I fear the priests are not capable of shame or of any other right feeling; for if they were, such a book would never have been written or received among them.

No. CCVI.

SATURDAY, JUNE 22D, 1822.

THE true religion has in all ages been opposed by error, idolatry, and superstition. The enmity of the seed of the serpent against the seed of the woman has not been suspended for a single day since the time of Cain and Abel; and he who was a liar from the beginning, and abode not in the truth, has never ceased to oppose the truth, or to pervert it, or to conceal it by substituting something in its place, or by any means to divert the minds of men from it, lest they should believe and be saved. This opposition to the truth has been carried on in various forms and under different names; but the general character of it has been substantially the same in all ages. It was reserved, however, for the last age of the world, or the New Testament dispensation, to exhibit it in a more systematic and organized form than it had been at any former period; and to effect its object more insidiously than before, by assuming the name of Christianity, and under that sacred name, to teach and practise all the idolatry and immorality of the ancient heathen.

This in the language of prophecy is emphatically called The Antichrist; and the impure character of the system is exhibited under the figure of a great harlot, corrupting the earth with her fornications. How applicable to the Church of Rome the description is, I hope will appear to the reader's satisfaction from the general tenor of my work, in which it has been my endeavour to exhibit the genuine character of Popery, for the purpose of warning my countrymen against it, and if possible of gaining some from under its deadly influence.

This great apostasy was the subject of very ancient prophecy. The Holy Spirit thus gave warning of the evil that was coming upon the world, that the true worshippers of God might be on their watch, and that those who were seduced by it might be without excuse. As early as the time of Daniel the prophet, we have the character of the system described, and even mention made of the period of its continuance; and I am not sure but there are obscure and parabolic allusions to it at a much earlier period. With an attempt to illustrate some of these, I shall occupy the present Number.

The God of Israel graciously condescended to speak of the union between him and his church under the figure of the marriage relation. Thus he says by one of the prophets,—"I remember thee, the kindness of thy youth, and the love of thine espousals;" Jer. ii. 2: and by another,—"Thy Maker is thy husband; the Lord of hosts is his name;" Isa. liv. 5. The church maintained the fidelity of a chaste spouse while she practised the worship of the true God according to the purity of his institution; but idolatry is, in numerous passages of the Old Testament, called, "playing the harlot." Indeed, in hundreds of instances the word adultery is used for idolatry; and when Israel showed the least leaning towards idolworship, she was accused of forgetting the marriage relation. The church then assumed the character of a strange woman; and there is one described by Solomon as THE Strange Woman, which from the narrative, I think, cannot mean an individual, any more than THE sinful man, or "Man of sin" can mean any one person. It is a power, or system,—a mystery of iniquity,—always at work; but so organized in the Church of Rome as to be described under the character of one great meretricious personage, seducing and corrupting the world by her allurements. I am by no means disposed to speak peremptorily on such a subject; and I am aware that there is danger of straining the language of prophecy, so as to make it speak what the Holy Spirit never intended, against which every writer on religious subjects ought to be on his guard; but after not a little reflection, I am inclined to think that an apostate church, or the antichrist, is pourtrayed by Solomon, under the character of the "strange woman, even the stranger who flattereth with her words; who forsaketh the guide of her youth, and forgetteth the covenant of her God; for her house inclineth unto death and her paths unto the dead. None that go unto her return again, neither take they hold of the path of life;" Prov. ii. 17—19. It is the boast of Popery that none who go unto her return again; and indeed there are so few who have left the profession of true religion, and who have taken up with this harlot, that are recovered from her snare, as to justify the declaration in general terms,—that there are none.

The same personage is described, and her wickedness exposed more particularly in the seventh chapter of the same book. I believe many persons in reading this, think that Solomon is only relating an incident that took place under his own eye in the streets of Jerusalem; and warning men to beware of a common street walker. But I cannot help thinking that more is meant than this. That part of divine revelation is professedly a book of parables; and I think the inspired penman, in this passage, takes occasion from the known practices of wicked seducers, and the folly of those who are seduced by them, to warn the worshippers of the true God in all ages, to beware of idolatry, which was not only adultery in a spiritual sense, but was usually connected with lasciviousness; which was indeed one of the allurements by which persons were drawn to the idol temple.

The seventh, eighth, and ninth chapters are evidently one discourse or parable, and in order to understanding their import they ought to be read together without a break. In doing so we find there are two ways, two houses, and two conspicuous persons, to whom the houses respectively belong. The persons, the houses, and the ways, or paths, are all contrasted, and opposed to each other. Of the first mentioned person, that is, the strange woman, it is said, "Her house is the way to hell, going down to the chambers of death;" and of the other, it is declared with equal explicitness;—"I lead in the way of righteousness, in the midst of the paths of judgment, to cause those that love me to inherit substance, and I will fill their treasures;" and "Blessed are they that keep my ways"—"for whoso findeth me findeth life." Here the way of death and the way of life are distinctly set before us; and they are respectively connected with the house of the strange woman on the one hand, and the house of Wisdom on the other.

I suppose there is little difference of opinion as to who is described under the name of WISDOM. He who says, "By me kings reign, and princes decree justice; by me princes rule, and nobles, yea, all the judges of the earth," must be the same divine person who is mentioned, in the 19th of Revelation, as having the name "King of kings, and Lord of lords." And he who was set up from everlasting, "from the beginning ere ever the earth was," &c. can be no other than he of whom it is declared by the apostle John, "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God." This is the Son of God, and the Saviour of the world, whose unsearchable riches the apostles preached; and who says of himself in this parable;—"Riches and honour are with me; yea, durable riches and righteousness."

There can be as little doubt as to what is meant by the HOUSE which, at the beginning of the 9th chapter, Wisdom is said to have built; "This man was counted worthy of more glory than Moses, inasmuch as he who hath builded the house hath more honour than the house. For every house is builded by some man; but he who built all things is God. And Moses verily was faithful in all his house as a servant, for a testimony of those things which were to be spoken after; but Christ as a Son over his own house; whose house are we, if we hold fast the confidence and the rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end;" Heb. iii. 1—6. The house of God is the church of the living God, 1 Tim. iii. 15. Christ constituted his church for the reception and edification of all who should be saved by his death; that is, of all who should believe in him from the beginning to the end of the world. He furnished it with every thing needful. He gave apostles and prophets, &c. who are pillars in his house;*

* The pillars are seven, which is also a parabolical exand the provision of it is described in language suitable to the period of sacrifices and peace-offerings; chap. ix. 2. The door of it is set open to all men; and men of every character, and rank, and nation, are invited to come in, and enjoy all the goodness of his house. Such seems to be the import of the following kind and intreating message, by her maidens; that is, by the servants of Wisdom, who in the parabolical language of the passage are called maidens, as is befitting the personification of Wisdom as a female: "She hath sent forth her maidens; she crieth upon the highest places of the city, Whoso is simple let him turn in hither; as for him that wanteth understanding, she saith to him, Come, eat of my bread, and drink of the wine which I have mingled; forsake the foolish and live, and go in the way of understanding." This is the gospel message to sinners as such, in language almost as plain as that by Isaiah:—"Ho! every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters," &c. chap. lv. 1. or that of Christ himself, "If any man thirst let him come unto me and drink." In short, Christ uses nearly the same language, in one of his parables, in which he represents a great king as making a feast, and commanding his servants to go to the high ways, and proclaim to all they met, "My oxen and fatlings are killed, all things are ready; come ye to the feast."

This house then, has an open door for passengers; and all are invited to enter. Now who is the person that is of importance enough to be described as having a rival establishment? and an establishment of such extent, that she also invites all passengers in the same universal terms, "Whoso is simple let him turn in hither," chap. ix. 15. Not surely a wretched individual street walker, whose allurements can ruin only a few persons, who are so foolish as to be ensnared by them, in the course of a short and miserable life. The language is far too high for this;—"She sitteth at the door of her house, on a seat in the high places of the city, to call passengers that go right on their ways;" chap. ix. 14, 15. Her house is as conspicuous as the temple itself; and "She hath cast down many wounded; yea, many strong men have been slain by her. Her house is the way to hell, going down to the chambers of death;" vii. 26, 27. At the conclusion of the parable she is called simply a foolish woman; but I apprehend it should be the foolish, or strange woman, for it is evidently the same personage that is described at the beginning. She is clamorous; that is, she makes great pretensions; and yet she knoweth nothing, for ignorance is the foundation of her throne.

In parabolical language, and also in prophetic vision, wickedness, or rather an organized system of wickedness, is represented as a female. There is a remarkable vision to this effect in the book of Zechariah, which, taken by itself, appears very obscure, and almost inexplicable; but if taken in connection with this parable of Solomon, and the vision of John in the 17th of Revelation, some light may be thrown upon it, and the passages may illustrate one another. "Then the angel that talked with me went forth, and said unto me, Lift up thine eyes, and see what is this that goeth forth. And I said, What is it? And he said, This is an ephah that goeth forth. He said, moreover, This is their resemblance through all the earth. And, behold, there was lifted up a talent of lead: and this is a woman that sitteth in the midst of the ephah. And he said, This is Wickedness, and he cast it into the midst of the ephah, and he cast the weight of lead upon the mouth thereof. Then lifted I up mine eyes, and looked, and, behold, there came out two women, and the wind was in their wings, (for they had wings like the wings of a stork) and they lift up the ephah between the earth and heaven. Then I said to the angel that talked with me, Whither do these bear the ephah? And he said unto me, To build it an house in the land of Shinar; and it shall be established, and set there upon her own base;" Zech. v. 5—11. The land of Shinar is Babylon; and we are told at the beginning of the book of Daniel, that Nebuchadnezzar, when he had taken Jerusalem, took the king and part of the vessels of the house of God, which he carried into the land of Shinar, to the house of his God. This was the place where idolatry was established, and upheld by the power that had subdued the world, and that was the most cruel oppressor of the church of God. Here, according to the vision of Zechariah, wickedness was to establish her seat and occupy her own house. But Zechariah saw his vision after Babylon had been taken and her mighty monarchy subverted. It is true; but there was another power to arise, to which the spirit of prophecy gave the same name, in which wickedness should be organized and established on her own base, or throne, and have a house built for herself. Her character is given more in detail in Rev. xvii. than that of the woman in the ephah; but the sum and substance of it is wickedness, and that the most monstrous and abominable. This personage is called "the great whore who sitteth upon many waters;" (the waters signify people and nations, as explained, v. 15,) "with whom the kings of the earth have committed fornication; and the inhabitants of the earth have been made drunk with the wine of her fornication. So he carried me away in pression. Seven was the first series of numbers with which men were acquainted. The days of the week were counted from the first to the seventh;—then the count began again; and time went round in perpetual circles of sevens. Hence the word seven came to express any thing that was perfect or complete; and it is so used hundreds of times in the Old and New Testament.

---

the spirit into the wilderness; and I saw a woman sit upon a scarlet-coloured beast, full of names of blasphemy, having seven heads and ten horns. And the woman was arrayed in purple and scarlet colour, and decked with gold, and precious stones, and pearls, and having a golden cup in her hand full of abominations and filthiness of her fornication. And upon her forehead was a name written, MYSTERY, BABYLON THE GREAT, THE MOTHER OF HARLOTS, AND ABOMINATIONS OF THE EARTH. And I saw the woman drunken with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus," Rev. xvii. 1—6. In the sequel, this mysterious woman is described under a variety of figures; in conclusion the figurative style is dropped, and we are told plainly, that this woman "is that great city which reigneth over the kings of the earth." That this means Rome, and nothing else, is so evident from the whole passage, that the most candid Papists admit it; only they apply it to Rome in her heathen state, before the establishment of Christianity. But that it means Rome under the name of Christian, has been demonstrated a hundred times by Protestant writers; and I defy all the Papists in the world to make sense of the passage as applied to any thing else. When John saw the vision, pagan Rome was in the zenith of its glory; and not a monster yet to rise, as the great harlot was.

This is the woman whose name is Wickedness; and, if I am not mistaken, the same that Zechariah saw in vision, shut up in the ephah, (bushel, or corn-measure) covered with a talent of lead, that is, restrained from expanding herself, or appearing to the world in her true character, till she was transported to the mystical Babylon, where she built her house and was established upon her own seat or throne: and this corresponds with what the apostle Paul tells us of the "Man of sin," and "Son of perdition:"—"Now ye know what withholdeth, that he might be revealed in his time. For the Mystery of iniquity doth already work; only he who now letteth, will let, (that is, hinder) until he be taken out of the way. And then shall that WICKED be revealed," &c. The secular Roman power was the talent of lead that suppressed, or prevented the expanding of this monster of wickedness; and when that power was taken out of the way, the harlot rose up in full stature, as the monster that has been described.

Again, if I am not mistaken, for I do not like to speak confidently on such a subject, I think this is the "Strange woman," described by Solomon as having set up a house in opposition to the house of Wisdom. This last, as I have shown, is the church of Christ; the rival establishment, therefore, is that of antichrist, which is the Church of Rome. That is, an organized system of opposition to Christianity under the Christian name; and while pretending to be the Catholic church,—claiming to be the only true church, she directs all her devotion to idols, such as relics, saints, and images; showing that she has forgotten her Lord and husband, who, she says, is not at home, but gone on a long journey; and she not only prostitutes herself to strangers, but becomes a public seductress; making it her business to make all men as wicked as herself.

One of the arts of antichrist, by which he seduces men from the faith and worship of Christ, is, to imitate divine institutions, and to adopt the very words of Christ, taking care, however, to turn them to a meaning the very opposite of what the Holy Spirit intends by them. In this Jesuitical trick the "Strange woman" is very expert. Wisdom is described as having killed her beasts, (that is, having made the sacrifice of atonement,) having mingled her wine, and furnished her table. The Strange woman professes to have a well furnished table too;—"I have peace-offerings with me; this day have I paid my vows;" she appears, therefore, a very religious person, strictly attentive to her duty; but there is one article wanting that vitiates all her professions. There is no animal slain; that is, there is no atoning sacrifice in her house. This is the first thing that is thought of in the house of God, into which there is no entering without regard to the blood sprinkled upon the lintel and the door-posts; and without reference to this, there are no peace-offerings in the house of God; for all these were ordained to follow upon the sacrifice of atonement being first offered: the meaning of which is, that God has no friendly intercourse with a sinner, acknowledges none of his thanksgivings, and accepts none of his peace-offerings, but in relation to Christ's atonement. But the strange woman, like other teachers of false religion, makes no account of any thing of this kind; she leaps to her peace-offerings at once, like Cain, who scorned to confess himself such a sinner as to require an atoning sacrifice, but brought a peace-offering of the fruits of the earth, as if there had been nothing between him and his Maker, why he should not be accepted; or like the proud Pharisee, who prayed thus, "God, I thank thee I am not as other men," &c. That this is in the very spirit of the Church of Rome appears in her virtually rejecting the atonement of Christ, and trusting in the merits of her saints, and in her mass sacrifice, which she declares to be propitiatory for the living and the dead.

Again, the Strange woman uses the very words of Christ, so far as serves her purpose; and breaks off in the middle of them, that she may effect the seduction and ruin of those who listen to her. Christ says, "Whoso is simple, let him turn in hither; as for him that wanteth understanding, she saith to him, Come eat of my bread, and drink of the wine that I have mingled. Forsake the foolish and live, and go in the way of understanding." The foolish woman stands at the door of her house making the same speech: "Whoso is simple, let him turn in hither; and as for him that wanteth understanding she saith to him,"—here she drops Christ's words, and turns away to the language of seduction,—"Stolen waters are sweet, and bread eaten in secret is pleasant;" and that this is meant to seduce to sin is evident from the words which immediately follow, and which conclude the parable, "He knoweth not that the dead are there, and that her guests are in the depths of hell."

Had Solomon been speaking of a common prostitute who had made such havoc among his subjects, wounding many and slaying many of them, it would have been his duty as a righteous king, to have made a public example of her, and to have destroyed her house; and this was no less his duty supposing her to have been an idol, and her house a temple. This he certainly would have done, in the state of mind in which he wrote the book of Proverbs, and before his melancholy fall into idolatry, or after his recovery from it, if he was recovered. But that he is speaking of a spiritual seduction, over which he had no authoritative control, is farther evident from the instructions which he gives for avoiding the snare, "Say unto wisdom, Thou art my sister; and call understanding thy kinswoman, that they may keep thee from the strange woman, from the stranger that flattereth with her words;" ch. vii. 4, 5. Wisdom here, I think, is not Christ personally; but the saving knowledge of him,—the spiritual understanding of his doctrine, which is the only sure preventive against error and all immorality; and not merely from one species of it, as most readers understand the passage. But supposing Christ himself to be meant, the exhortation would be substantially the same; "Acquaint thyself with Him, and thereby good shall come unto thee."

No. CCVII.

SATURDAY, JUNE 29TH, 1822.

IN my last Number I endeavoured to illustrate some of the prophecies of the Old Testament, which, I think, have reference to the grand apostasy from the worship of the true God; in which the apostate church is described under the figure of wickedness embodied and organized, and as the great harlot seducing and ruining the souls of men. In the prophecies of Daniel we have the same system of wickedness predicted under the figure of a horn, which is an emblem of power and dominion. The four successive monarchies are represented as so many wild beasts, the fourth of which exceeded in fierceness all the rest. "It was dreadful and terrible, and strong exceedingly; and it had great iron teeth; it devoured and brake in pieces, and stamped the residue with the feet of it: and it was diverse from all the beasts which were before it, and it had ten horns." "The fourth beast shall be the fourth kingdom upon earth, which shall be diverse from all kingdoms, and shall devour the whole earth, and shall tread it down, and break it in pieces;" Dan. vii. 7, 23. This, I believe, is allowed on all hands to be the Roman empire; and the ten horns signify as many kingdoms. Besides these ten there was another little horn to spring up, which was to be distinguished from all the rest: "I considered the horns, and behold there came up among them another little horn, before whom there were three of the first horns plucked up by the roots: and, behold, in this horn were eyes like the eyes of a man, and a mouth speaking great things;" ver. 8. This little horn was to rise up after the others, or behind them, unobserved till he should overtop them; "And he shall be diverse from the first, and he shall subdue three kings (or kingdoms;) and he shall speak great words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High, and think to change times and laws; and they shall be given into his hand, until a time, times, and the dividing of a time. But the judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his dominion, to consume it, and destroy it unto the end;" ver. 24—26. "This is no other than the Popedom, or antichrist, who hath raised himself to great power by seizing three principalities or kingdoms, which Sir Isaac Newton reckons up to be the exarchate of Ravenna, the kingdom of the Lombards, and the senate and dukedom of Rome. And it is hence that the Pope wears a triple crown."—Signs of the Times, by Bicheno, p. 17.

"What is here represented as a horn of the fourth beast is the same tyranny which is shown to John (Rev. xiii. 1—10.) as a beast In this all our best commentators are agreed. Nor let it seem strange that what is here prefigured by a horn of the fourth beast, should be represented in another vision, as a beast with seven heads and ten horns. For nothing is more usual than to describe the same person or thing under different images, upon different occasions; and besides, in this vision, the spiritual tyranny of the Roman empire is not meant to be described at large. Here notice is only given of it in the general representation of the Roman dominion; when the time of the appearance of this tyranny draws near, then a more enlarged description is given. And what is here represented under one image is there represented under two, a dragon and a beast, each having seven heads and ten horns. The slightest attention is sufficient to convince us that the horn here and the first beast in Rev. xiii. are the same tyranny; if we compare the two descriptions, their language, their enormities, their duration, and end are the same." —Ibid

It is not my intention to write a dissertation on the prophecies. There are plenty of books on these, written by men who understand them much better than I can pretend to do. What I intend is to show in few words, that the Holy Spirit warned the church in ancient times, that a monster should arise in the latter days, whose character corresponds in every particular with that of the Church of Rome. He is one who speaks great words against the Most High. The greatest words which a creature can speak against the Most High, are those which claim equality with him, or which claim to hold his place, and to exercise his authority. This has been done by the Church of Rome for twelve hundred years. I do not speak merely of the high titles assumed by the Pope, such as, "His Holiness," which is his acknowledged title as much as "His Majesty" is that of our Sovereign; nor of "our Lord God, the Pope," as he is styled by his flattering courtiers; nor of "the Prince of the Kings of the Earth," as he affects to be, and agreeably to which he has disposed of kings and kingdoms. It is enough that this church sets up her authority as at least equal to that of God, if not superior to it, by lording it over the consciences of men, presuming to dictate what they shall believe, and actually setting aside the authority of the word of God, which she does every day by her traditions. The head of this church pretends to be God's vicar on earth; that is, to hold God's place, and to be instead of God to human creatures; and, considering what his personal character has generally been, no greater words against God can be spoken, than that this is his representative.

"He shall think to change times and laws;" and not only think, or imagine the thing, but actually do it. The Church of Rome has changed half of the year, in which men ought to follow their lawful business, into holy time, in which they must not do any work; and she allows the Lord's day, the only holy time recognized in the New Testament, to be prostituted by her children to the purposes of amusement. And as for laws, she has used such freedom with the law of God as to strike one of the ten commandments out of the decalogue, because it forbids the worship of images; and she has taken all the matter of the other commandments under her control, insomuch that disobedience and obedience are just what she is pleased to declare. She makes a thing unlawful to-day; and then, by a dispensation, for a stipulated price, she makes it lawful to-morrow. There was never such trafficking among the heathen as there is in the Church of Rome in relation to the divine law. This is so changed by Popery, that a man may live in the habitual flagrant violation of all its precepts; and though it says peremptorily, "The soul that sinneth it shall die," a Popish priest professes to have the power of absolving the greatest transgressor, at the hour of death, and of giving him a sure passport to heaven. In short, the law of God, which is holy, just, and good, is so changed in the Church of Rome as to be quite subverted; and to have a system of priestcraft and immorality put in its place. "They shall be given into his hand until a time, times, and the dividing of a time;" that is, three years and a half, or 1260 days, according to the Jewish mode of reckoning, which was 360 days to a year; which, according to prophetic language, means 1260 years. During this long period, it was predicted by Daniel that this system of iniquity should be suffered to have power on the earth, to blaspheme the God of heaven, by speaking great words against him,—to change or subvert his laws, and practise all manner of iniquity.

But the vision presents another feature of the character of the monster, which applies most decidedly to the Church of Rome; "He shall wear out the saints of the Most High." There was never in the world, under any name, a power of whom this can be so truly said as of Popery. From the time that the beast was established on his throne, no man within the sphere of his influence was permitted to believe and publish the genuine gospel of the grace of God, and to serve God as his saints in the time of the apostles did. The Christian doctrine having been corrupted, and divine institutions superseded by human inventions, if any man dared to profess the unadulterated gospel, and to worship God with New Testament simplicity, it was at the hazard of his life. Genuine Christianity was proscribed as heresy; and every potentate, and every private individual, whom the church could move by her promises or threats, was called to labour to the utmost of his power in the pious—the meritorious work of extirpating heresy; that is, to use words of Pope Innocent in his bull to that effect, "to root out, and cause to perish the venomous adders" who presumed to believe and worship according as they were instructed by the word of God.

By persevering in this course for ages, the Church of Rome succeeded in "wearing out" the saints; not absolutely, for God still had witnesses for the truth on the earth; but so worn out, and exterminated, that they were comparatively few for a long period. What a wasting and wearing out of the saints does this represent, during the long period of 1260 years! It has been said, that persecution tends to the increase of a persecuted sect, which may be true of moderate persecution, if there be such a thing; but not of such persevering, relentless, and savage persecution as that of the Church of Rome, especially where the Inquisition was established; for it is a fact, that in many places, particularly in Spain, this horrid engine of Popish tyranny prevailed to the entire extirpation of what they called heresy. The saints of the Most High were quite worn out in these parts. No man could even think in his heart what was taught in the word of God; for his confessor would have brought it out of him, and have sent him to the rack and the fire if he did not recant.

In the crusade against the Waldenses hundreds of thousands were murdered in cold blood, or died of cold and hunger upon the mountains; yet the light of the true religion was never altogether extinguished there, as it was in Spain by the Inquisition. The inhabitants of the mountains and valleys of Piedmont were exposed to the most cruel persecution, centuries before the Reformation, and it was continued, with little interruption, down to the middle of the seventeenth century. It was on the occasion of a dreadful massacre of them in 1655, that Milton wrote the following sonnet, which Mr Jones has given as a motto in the title page of his History of the Waldenses, a book which I recommended in an early part of my work, and which I again recommend to all who wish to know what Christians have suffered from the Church of Rome.

Avenge, O Lord, thy slaughter'd saints, whose bones
Lie scatter'd on the Alpine mountains cold;
Even them who kept thy truth so pure of old
When all our fathers worshipp'd stocks and stones,
Forget not; in thy book record their groans
Who were thy sheep, and in their ancient fold
Slain by the bloody Piemontise that roll'd
Mother and infant down the rocks: their moans
The vales redoubled to the hills, and they
To heaven. Their martyr'd blood and ashes sow
O'er all the Italian fields, where still doth sway
The triple tyrant; that from these may grow
A hundred fold, who having learned thy way
Early may fly the Babylonian woe.

The following curious document shows in what a cold-blooded manner a Papist can plan and even execute the extirpation of heretics. It is a letter from father La Chaise, Confessor to Louis XIV., to father Peters, Confessor to James II. of England, in 1688. It is furnished to "The Antidote" by Sir Harcourt Lees, who, for its authenticity, refers to the seventh volume, 4to. of the collection of manuscript papers selected from the library of Edward Harley, Earl of Oxford.

Father La Chaise's Project for the Extirpation of Heretics, in a letter from him to Father P——rs, 1688.

WORTHY FRIEND,

I received yours of the 20th of June last, and am glad to hear of your good success, and that our party gains ground so fast in England; but, concerning the question you have put to me, that is, "What is the best course to be taken to root out all heretics?" to this I answer, there are divers ways to do that, but we must consider which is the best to make use of in England. I am sure you are not ignorant how many thousand heretics we have in France, by the power of our dragoons, converted in the space of one year: and by the doctrine of those booted apostles, turned more in one month, than Christ and his apostles could in ten years. This is a most excellent method, and far excels those of the great preachers and teachers that have lived since Christ's time. But I have spoken with divers fathers of our society, who do think that your king is not strong enough to accomplish his design by such kind of force; so that we cannot expect to have our work done in that manner, for the heretics are too strong in the three kingdoms; and therefore we must seek to convert them by fair means, before we fall upon them with fire, sword, halters, gaols, and other such like punishments; and therefore I can give you no better advice, than to begin with soft, easy means. Wheedle them by promises of profit and places of honour, till you have made them dip themselves in treasonable actions against the laws established, and then they are bound to serve for fear. When they have done thus, turn them out, and serve others so, by putting them in their places; and by this way gain as many as you can. And for the heretics that are in places of profit and honour, turn them out, or suspend them on pretence of misbehaviour; by which their places are forfeited, and they subject to what judgment you please to give upon them. Then you must form a camp, that must consist of none but Catholics; this will make the heretics heartless, and conclude all means of relief and recovery is gone. And lastly, take the short and the best way, which is, to surprise the heretics on a sudden; and to encourage the zealous Catholics, let them sacrifice them all, and wash their hands in their blood, which will be an acceptable offering to God. And this was the method I took in France, which hath well, you see, succeeded; but it cost me many threats and promises, before I could bring it thus far; our king being a long time very unwilling. But at last I got him on the hip; for he had lain with his daughter-in-law, for which I would by no means give him absolution, till he had given me an instrument, under his own hand and seal, to sacrifice all the heretics in one day. Now, as soon as I had my desired commission, I appointed the day when this should be done; and, in the mean time, made ready some thousands of letters, to be sent into all parts of France in one post night. I was never better pleased than at that time; but the king was affected with some compassion for the Hugonots, because they had been a means to bring him to his crown and throne; and the longer he was under it, the more sorrowful he was; often complaining, and desiring me to give him his commission again;

but that I would by no persuasion do; advising him to repent of that heinous sin, and also telling him, that the trouble and horror of his spirit did not proceed from any thing of evil in those things that were to be done, but from that wickedness that he had done; and that he must resolve to undergo the severe burden of a troubled mind for one of them or the other; and if he would remain satisfied as it was, his sin being forgiven, there would, in a few days, be a perfect atonement made for it, and he perfectly reconciled to God again. But all this would not pacify him; for the longer the more restless; and I therefore ordered him to retire to his closet, and spend his time constantly in prayer, without permitting any one to interrupt him; and this was in the morning early, when, the evening following, I was to send away all my letters. I did, indeed, make the more haste, for fear he should disclose it to any body, yet I had given him a strict charge to keep it to himself; and the very things that I most feared, to my great sorrow, came to pass; for just in the nick of time, the devil, who hath at all times his instruments at work, sent the Prince of Conde to the court, who asked for the king; he was told that he was in his closet, and would speak with no man. He impudently answered, "that he must and would speak with him," and so went directly to his closet; he being a great peer, no man durst hinder him. And, being come to the king, he soon perceived by his countenance, that he was under some great trouble of mind; for he looked as if he had been going into the other world immediately. "Sir," said he, "what is the matter with you?" The king at first refused to tell him, but he pressing harder upon him, at last the king, with a sorrowful complaint, burst out, and said—"I have given father La Chaise a commission, under my hand, to murder all the Hugonots in one day; and this evening will the letters be despatched to to all parts, by the post, for the performing it; so that there is but small time left for my Hugonot subjects to live, who have never done me any harm." Whereupon this cursed rogue answered, "Let him give you your commission again." The king said, "How shall I get it out of his hand? For, if I send to him for it, he will refuse to send it." This devil answered, "If your majesty will give me order, I will quickly make him return it." The king was soon persuaded, being willing to give ease to his troubled spirit, and said, "Well, go then, and break his neck, if he will not give it you." Whereupon this son of the devil went to the post-house, and asked, if I had not a great number of letters there? And they said, "Yes, more than I had sent in a whole year before." "Then," said the prince, "by order from the king, you must deliver them all to me;" which they durst not deny, for they knew well enough who he was. And no sooner was he got into the post-house, and had asked these questions, but I came also in after him, to give order to the postmaster to give notice to all those under him, in the several parts of the kingdom, that they should take care to deliver my letters with all speed imaginable. But I was no sooner entered the house but he gave his servants order to secure the door, and said confidently to me, "You must, by order from the king, give me the commission, which you have forced from him." I told him I had it not about me, but would go and fetch it; thinking to get from him, and so go out of town, and send the contents of those letters another time; but he said, "You must give it; and if you have it not about you, send somebody to fetch it, or else never expect to go alive out of my hands; for I have an order from the king either to bring it back or break your neck, and am resolved either to carry that back to him in my hand, or else your heart's blood on the point of my sword." I would have made my escape, but he set his sword to my breast, and said, "You must give it me, or die; therefore deliver it, or else this goes through your body."

So, when I saw nothing else would do, I put my hand in my pocket and gave it him; which he carried immediately to the king, and gave him that and all my letters, which they burned. And, being all done, the king said, now his heart was at ease. Now, how he should be eased by the devil, or so well satisfied with a false joy, I cannot tell; but this I know, that it was a very wicked and ungodly action, as well in His Majesty, as the Prince of Conde, and did not a little increase the burden and danger of His Majesty's sins. I soon gave an account of this affair to several fathers of our society, who promised to do their best to prevent the aforesaid prince's doing such another act, which was accordingly done; for within six days after the damned action, he was poisoned, and well he deserved it. The king also did suffer too, but in another fashion, for disclosing the design unto the prince, and hearkening unto his counsel. And many a time since, when I have had him at confession, I have shook hell about his ears, and made him sigh, fear, and tremble, before I would give him absolution; nay, more than that, I have made him beg for it on his knees, before I would consent to absolve him. By this, I saw that he had still an inclination to me, and was willing to be under my government: so I set the baseness of the action before him, by telling the whole story, and how wicked it was, and that it could not be forgiven, till he had done some good action to balance that, and expiate the crime. Whereupon, he at last asked me, what he must do? I told him, that he must root out all heretics from his kingdom. So, when he saw there was no rest for him, without doing it, he did again give them all into the power of me and our clergy, under this condition, that we would not murder them, as he had before given orders, but that we should by fair means, or force, convert them to the Catholic religion. Now, when we had got the commission, we presently put it in practice; and what the issue had been, you very well know. But now in England the work cannot be done after this manner, as you may perceive by what I have said to you; so that I cannot give you better counsel, than to take that course in hand wherein we were so unhappily prevented; and I doubt not, but it may have better success with you than with us.

I would write to you of many other things, but I fear I have already detained you too long, wherefore I will write no more at present, but that I am

Your friend and servant,
LA CHAISE.

Paris, July 8th, 1688.

No. CCVIII.

SATURDAY, JULY 6TH, 1822.

I HAVE shown that the Antichrist was a subject of Old Testament prophecy; and that in the New Testament he is pointed out in such characters as identify him with the Church of Rome. The centre of his power was to be that great city, which, in the time of the apostle John, reigned over the kings of the earth; and such was the state of the world at that time, that the words cannot be applied to any city but Rome.

But there are two passages in Paul's epistles, in which the character of this monster of wickedness is portrayed with wonderful precision. They are as follow:—"Now we beseech you, brethren, by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and by our gathering together unto him, that ye be not soon shaken in mind, or be troubled, neither by spirit, nor by word, nor by letter, as from us, as that the day of Christ is at hand. Let no man deceive you by any means; for that day shall not come except there come a falling away first, and that Man of Sin be revealed, the son of perdition, who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped; so that he, as God, sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God. Remember ye not, that when I was yet with you, I told you these things? And now ye know what withholdeth, that he might be revealed in his time. For the mystery of iniquity doth already work; only he that now letteth will let, until he be taken out of the way. And then shall that Wicked be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming: even him whose coming is after the working of Satan, with all power, and signs, and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish: because they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved. And for this cause God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie; that they all might be condemned who believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness;" 2 Thess. ii. 1—12. "Now the Spirit speaketh expressly that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils; speaking lies in hypocrisy, having their conscience seared with a hot iron; forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth;" 1 Tim. iv. 1—3.

In these two passages the whole system is described, from the comparatively small abridgment of Christian liberty, by forbidding to eat flesh on certain days, up to the universal and tyrannical domination of one who puts himself in the place of God, claiming and exercising absolute authority over the bodies and the souls of men;—even exalting himself above all that is called God or that is worshipped, by presuming to alter what God has ordained, and to withhold or give the word of God at his pleasure. It is not necessary to ascribe all this to the Pope in his single person; or to say that he alone is the Man of Sin, or Son of Perdition, or the Antichrist. It is the system of superstition, idolatry, and arbitrary domination over the consciences of men, skilfully organized, and rigorously exercised by the church of which the Pope is the acknowledged head.

Paul in his preaching to the Thessalonians had told them these things. They had mistaken something that he had said to them, or something that he had written in his first epistle about the last judgment, expecting that the end of the world was just at hand. Here he corrects their mistake, and assures them that a great apostasy should take place before the end of the world; and he informs them farther, that it was begun. It was not then revealed, or publicly manifested; but it was working in secret, and would be revealed in due time, and appear in great power, when the obstruction was taken out of the way.

It was working among all the churches in Galatia where certain false teachers perverted the gospel, and taught the people to trust for salvation, partly at least, to their observance of rites and ceremonies. This was the same thing as to deny Christ altogether; for if righteousness came in that way, Christ had died in vain. This is substantially the same error that pervades the whole system of Popery; which teaches to trust for salvation to the efficacy of sacraments, especially of the mass sacrifice; and if this were really propitiatory, as the Church of Rome teaches, Christ must have died in vain, for his death was unnecessary, upon the supposition that any other sacrifice could serve the purpose of propitiation, or making an atonement for sin. The mystery of iniquity began also to work in the church in Corinth, when the members were divided into parties, calling themselves by the names of mere men, though these men were apostles. One said, I am of Paul; another, I am of Apollos; and another, I am of Cephas. These were the orders of monks and nuns in embryo. They were the Augustinians, and the Franciscans, and Dominicans of the day. And yet what could be more harmless than the thing appeared at first? It was only every one paying a compliment to his favourite preacher, and they were all inspired men to whom this was paid. Yes: but the apostle says, it was because they were carnal; and it was from this apparently trifling error of the carnal mind, that the system of religious orders arose. It was not like calling different sects by their leaders, such as Luther and Calvin, though, I think, there is antichrist in that too; but it was forming different religious orders in the same church, that was the fault of the Corinthians; and for this the Church of Rome has been distinguished above all others.

It is not my intention to illustrate and apply the different parts of the above passages, because I have already touched on them all, in different parts of my work, particularly under the head of worshipping saints, which is meant by the doctrines of demons, that is, deifying departed spirits as the heathen did. Forbidding to marry, I have discussed under the head of clerical celibacy. Speaking lies in hypocrisy, has been exposed in every view which I have given of the character of Popery; as also the deceivableness of unrighteousness, and the lying wonders by which she imposes on the world.

There is one part of the description, of which, indeed, I have said little or nothing; that is, the manner and the means by which Popery shall be destroyed and rooted out of the world. The apostle says of that wicked one, "The Lord shall consume him with the spirit of his mouth, and destroy him with the brightness of his coming." But as this is not yet accomplished, there is danger of mistaking, at least of not taking up the full import of the prediction. Those who live a few ages hence will understand the passage much better than we of the present age can do. No doubt, however, there is this implied in it, that one great instrument by means of which God will destroy this system of delusion and idolatry, will be his own word. This, I suppose, is what is meant by the spirit of his mouth. When John saw a vision of Christ in his glory, there was the appearance of a sword proceeding out of his mouth; and elsewhere he is said to "fight against his enemies by the sword of his mouth," Rev. ii. 16, that is, by the almighty energy of his word, which is "quick and powerful, sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow; and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart;" Heb. iv. 12; Eph. vi. 17. It dissects and lays open the mind and heart of man; kills and destroys the principle of error and enmity against God; and imparts a new mind to the acknowledgment of the truth, with submission to the divine righteousness and the divine will. It is in this way that Christ subdues his enemies.

The sword which John saw coming out of the mouth of Christ, was, I suppose, like a ray of light or flame of fire, and so it corresponds with what is here called the spirit of his mouth, and "the brightness of his coming;" and this reminds us of the magnificent description of the prophet Daniel, when he saw a vision relating to this very subject, namely, the destruction of Antichrist: "I beheld till the thrones were cast down, and the Ancient of Days did sit, whose garment was white as snow, and the hair of his head like the pure wool: his throne was like the fiery flame, and his wheels like burning fire. A fiery stream issued and came forth from before him: thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him: the judgment was set, and the books were opened. I beheld then, because of the voice of the great words which the horn spake: I beheld, even till the beast was slain, and his body destroyed and given to the burning flame;" chap. vii. 9—11. "The judgment set," in this passage, is not the last judgment; but what the angel described to John, as the "judgment of the great whore, who did corrupt the earth with her fornications." See Rev. xviith, xviiith, xixth, throughout. And in the passage in Daniel, we find, immediately after the beast is destroyed, the nations of the world are given to Christ; that is, they are converted by the gospel preached to them; and the preachers, I suppose, are the thousand thousands that minister to the Ancient of Days, and the ten thousand times ten thousand, meaning a great indefinite number, that stand before him. These, enlightened and animated by the fiery stream issuing from the mouth of God, carry the light and the influence of it throughout the world; and all nations shall be converted to the Messiah, who has received in promise, from his Father, the heathen for his inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for his possessions.

But these heavenly messengers are represented as standing before God, and ministering to him, before the beast is destroyed; from which it is probable that their ministry will be the means of his destruction. By preaching the gospel, with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven, and giving copies of the bible in every language, the minds of men shall be enlightened, and turned from the power of Satan to God. They shall then cast their idols to the moles and to the bats. They shall renounce the Pope and all the mummery of their apostate church; and thousands of truly holy churches shall rise up in its stead. At the same time, other messengers will be labouring in all parts of the Pagan world; and by the blessing of the same divine Spirit, the heathen also will forsake their idols, and submit to the Saviour. The Lord shall be one, and his name one, to the ends of the earth. That which is now a wilderness shall become like Eden, and the desert shall be like the garden of the Lord.

I am aware that most people expect that Antichrist will be destroyed by means of dreadful temporal judgments, which are described as vials of wrath, poured out upon the seat of the beast. These are, pestilence, and famine, and earthquakes, and desolating wars, by means of which the nations which gave their power to the beast,—which have been corrupted and seduced by her,—shall be depopulated and almost exterminated. All this may happen, and, I suppose, something like this will take place, when the judgment of the great whore is to be executed; but all this would not destroy the Man of Sin; it would in fact make no impression upon him, but to make him more sinful by blaspheming God on account of these plagues. Millions of supporters of the beast may perish by these judgments; but the beast himself cannot be killed by any material weapon; for his soul is as immaterial as the soul of man. When the judgment takes place, his body shall be cast into the burning flame; that is, his material form, as existing and organized in different nations, shall be destroyed. But nothing can destroy the subtle intellectual enmity against God, in which his soul consists, but the Spirit of God's mouth, and the brightness of his coming; that is, the gospel of the grace of God, by which he subdues his enemies, and converts them to himself. Where Antichrist is not destroyed in this way, he is not destroyed at all; for he reigns with full power in the hearts of all who live and die in their sins; and though he cannot properly be said to reign after the judgment is executed upon him, he will continue to exist in the regions of despair, with the full malignity of his heart against God, for ever and ever.

Another subject of inquiry is,— When shall this antichristian system be destroyed?—and it is perhaps still more difficult to answer this question than that relating to the means of his destruction. We all know it shall be at the end of the 1260 prophetic days, that is, years; but no one can tell with certainty when this period commenced. The mystery of iniquity was working in secret in the days of the apostles; and the monster grew up so gradually and imperceptibly, that we cannot tell the precise year when he became organically the Man of Sin, any more than we can mark the precise moment of twilight when day ceases, and night begins. In his gradual progress to supreme power, however, he left a few landmarks, if I may use the expression, from which we can take our departure in measuring the period of his reign. We cannot say with certainty which of these landmarks is the last from which we ought to reckon. There is one, to which if we add 1260 years, we are brought down to the period of Luther's reformation; there is another, to which if we add the same number, we come to the era of the French Revolution. But though Popery received a wound at these periods, particularly the first, the event has shown that neither of them was the termination of the beast's reign, and therefore neither of the points of departure was the final one, or that at which the beast reached the zenith of his power; but as they mark certain steps of his elevation, so the prophetic number points out corresponding steps of his decline. I think one of the most prominent landmarks in his progress is that when the Pope was declared universal bishop, which took place in the year 607, to which if we add 1260 we have 1867, or 45 years from the present date; and several modern authors have fixed on this as the period when the Man of Sin shall be destroyed. But the Pope had a farther elevation after he was made universal bishop. He became a temporal prince 150 years thereafter, and perhaps his reign may be prolonged for that period beyond the above date. At all events, I am not so sanguine as to hope to live to see his downfall, though I may live to see a considerable enlargement of his power, perhaps his re-establishment in certain dominions which he had lost. But I confess, I am a mere tyro in these matters, having never applied my mind to this kind of calculation; and instead of quoting the words of other authors, I think it better to refer to their works, because they can easily be had, and from their own merit they are worthy of attentive perusal. "Dissertation on the Seals and Trumpets, and the Prophetic Number of 1260 Days, by William Cunninghame, Esq." "Two Essays on Daniel's Prophetic Number of 2300 Days, by the Rev. Mr Mason." "The Fall of Babylon the Great," by the same. Also Bicheno's "Signs of the Times," and other writings.

I intended, before concluding, to have made free use of the Reverend Mr Graham's Annals of Ireland, and Sir Richard Musgrave's History of the Rebellion of 1798, as illustrative of the cruel and sanguinary character of Popery. But I find I should not do justice to these works without writing another volume at least, and it would scarcely be justice to the authors to reprint so much of the matter as would be necessary to give a full view of the subjects. It must therefore refer to the works themselves; the first of which shows immense industry and research into the records of the kingdom for the 16th and 17th centuries; and the second shows no less attention to events which took place within our own memory. My copy of the work is a present from a Right Honourable Senator, who certifies under his hand on a blank leaf, that the facts are correctly stated, he having had command of a regiment, with which he served during the whole period of the troubles, so that he was an eye-witness of many of the atrocities which were committed; and such scenes were acted as would have disgraced the most barbarous savages.

There is much in the state of Ireland at present, and in the state and progress of Popery in England, considered in connection with the attempts of Protestants to get Papists set over them, that might admit of profitable discussion; but I cannot enter upon these things without danger of transgressing the law as it now stands with regard to periodical publications. "Emancipation," as an abstract question, I have discussed at considerable length in this volume;* but I must not touch on passing events, or matters pending in parliament, because this would incur the Newspaper duty. I do not, upon the whole, regret that my field of discussion has been narrowed on this account; because it has kept me more closely to what was my original object—the exposure of the religious errors of Popery. To those who wish to see sound Protestant principles maintained on political grounds, I would strongly recommend the "True Briton," and the "Antidote." The former is a London daily Paper, and the latter a Dublin weekly one. The London "Sun" and "Morning Post" have given many excellent letters on the subject of emancipation, and the "Courier" a good article now and then: but the two first named are established upon the avowed principle of maintaining the Protestant ascendency and the Revolution settlement. Most of the popular journals on the opposition side are on the side of the enemy; and with strange inconsistency, while professing to be advocates of civil and religious liberty, they plead for admitting to power over us, the determined enemies of all liberty, except that of being allowed to trample upon their fellow-creatures, and to bring all men under their yoke. To bring such men into political power in our Protestant country may be friendly to liberty, but I suspect it would be such liberty as that which Jeremiah was commanded to proclaim, chap. xxxiv. 17. that is, a liberty to the sword, and to all the miseries which follow.

I come now to take farewell of my readers, which I do with thankful acknowledgments for their long-continued approbation, countenance and support. If I have been honoured in any degree to serve the cause of truth, it is in a great measure owing to them; for, instead of continuing to write four years, I should probably not have continued three months, had my writings been despised, or received with indifference. My thanks are also due to my numerous and respectable correspondents, in Scotland, England, and Ireland, for their valuable communications, and for pointing out sources of information, which they justly supposed would not be familiar to one, who has been engaged all his life in mercantile and other secular pursuits.

* Since this was written, a bill for the emancipation of the Catholics, as it was popularly called, was finally passed in the year 1829, mainly through the influence of the Duke of Wellington and the former opposers of the measure. The following abstract of the fate of various motions respecting it may not be unacceptable to our readers. In the year 1805, a majority of 129 in the house of lords, and of 212 in the house of commons, refused to act on the petition of the Catholics, moved severally by lord Grenville and Mr Fox. In 1807, lord Grenville withdrew his motion in favour of emancipation, it being understood that his majesty was averse to it. In 1808, Mr Grattan's motion was rejected, in the house of commons, by a majority of 153, and lord Donoughmore's, in the house of lords, by a majority of eighty-seven. In 1810, a motion to the same effect, by the same members, was again lost, by a majority of 112 in the commons, and 86 in the lords. In 1812, there was a majority of 72 in the lords, and 85 in the commons, against the movers. Mr Canning's motion was lost, in the same year, by a majority of 129 in the commons, and that of the Marquis of Wellesley, by a majority of 113 in the lords. In 1813, the motions of Mr Grattan, Sir John Cox Hippesley, and doctor Duigenan, drew forth majorities against the Catholics of forty, forty-eight, and forty-two, and on the 24th of May, the bill was given up. In 1821, Mr Plunkett carried the bill through the house of commons by a majority of nineteen; but it was lost in the lords by a majority of thirty-nine. In 1822, Mr Canning carried it, in the commons, by a majority of twenty-one; but it was thrown out, in the lords, by a majority of forty-two. In 1825, Sir Francis Burdett carried it, in the commons, by a majority of twenty-seven; but it was again thrown out, in the lords, by a majority of forty-eight. In 1827, Sir Francis Burdett's motion for a committee was lost, in the commons, by a majority of three. In 1828, the motion for a conference with the lords was carried, in the commons, by a majority of six; but thrown out, in the lords, by a majority of forty-five. And, in 1829 (April 10), a relief bill, abolishing the civil disabilities on Roman Catholics, by repealing the oaths of supremacy, &c., was carried through the commons by Mr Peel, with a majority of 180 on the second reading, and 178 on the third; and through the lords, by the duke of Wellington, with a majority of 105 on the second reading, and 104 on the third. By this bill, Catholics are eligible to all offices of state, excepting the lord-chancellorships of England and Ireland, the lord-lieutenancy of Ireland, the office of regent or guardian of the United Kingdom, and that of high commissioner to the church of Scotland. They are still excluded from the right of presentation to livings, and all places connected with the ecclesiastical courts and establishment. The church patronage attached to any office in the hands of a Catholic is vested in the archbishop of Canterbury. Attached to the bill is a clause for the gradual suppression of the Jesuits and monastic orders (religious establishments of females excepted). At the same time, the duke carried a disfranchisement bill, by which the forty shilling freeholders of Ireland were disfranchised, and the income of real estate necessary to entitle to a vote in elections in that country raised to ten pounds sterling.

There is one subject that I have never mentioned in my pages, but which it would be unpardonable not to notice before I conclude; that is, the handsome and liberal manner in which the public came forward a year ago, to relieve me of the heavy expense of Mr Scott's lawsuit. This was quite unsolicited on my part; and though I am neither so rich, nor so indifferent to the things of the world, as to make no account of a sum bordering on fourteen hundred pounds, I have always considered the expression of the public mind in my favour as infinitely more valuable than mere pecuniary remuneration. The sum subscribed has not indeed been equal to the charge, but it has been more than my friends contemplated as necessary at the time, for the court did not fix the amount for nearly six months after the trial; and when I have added the profits of my work not previously given for charitable purposes, my loss will not be very great; but had I sustained the loss of the whole, I should have considered it honourable to suffer in so good a cause.

Though I retire from the field at present, I am determined to hold myself in readiness to meet any champion of Popery who may arise; for it is probable some coward will sculk out from his hiding-place, when he thinks he has no enemy to fear. I remind all such, that I have kept undisputed possession of the field for two years and a half; and that I am ready to return to it at an hour's notice, if any Papist shall have courage enough to show a face disposed to renew the contest.

Since it has gone abroad that I was about to conclude, I have been pressed with the most urgent solicitations to write another volume; and several subjects have been suggested to me both by word and letter. But having gone over all the great topics of controversy with the Church of Rome, I feel convinced in my own mind, that unless some new champion of Popery should arise, I could not keep up the spirit of the work, and retain the hold which it has on the minds of my intelligent readers, for another year. I have always held it wise in a writer, as well as a speaker, to stop when he is done; and I should be sorry to think, that any person found out the secret, that I was done, before myself.

INDEX.

A

Absolutions of the Romish Church, 63, 64; document from Rome granting the power of absolution, 607.
Adrian, IV. Pope, Bull of, regarding Ireland, 745.
Albigenses, persecutions of the, 82 and 517—523; references to historical works on the subject, 520, n.
Alcala, declaration of the university of, 129.
Alum Works, the pope a proprietor of certain, 52; his imprecations on a workman for absconding and revealing the secrets of the trade, 53.
America, United States of, curious case between a priest and his bishop there, 713—715; state of Popery in, 715—719.
Amicus Veritatis, letters of, and replies to, 12—32; Advertisement by, 34; animadverted on, 42; False quotation from Luther's works by, 39; Further replies to, 75, et seq. and 89, et seq.; his observations about Luther and Good Works exposed, 501, 507—509; his statement about Pope Urban VIII.'s bull answered, 541; detected as a plagiarist, 615; his arguments about indulgences and dispensations answered, 616—619; his allegations against Luther, Knox, and other reformers rebutted, 619—623.
Amphibolus, a fictitious saint of the isle of Man, 210.
Andrews, St, Paul Craw, an early reformer, burnt at, 84; Patrick Hamilton burnt at, 85; other persecutions there, 86.
Andrews, W. E., his Catholic Vindicator, 143; his School Book compared to the Bible, ib.; maintains the lawfulness of breaking faith, 178, 179; his remarks upon devotion to the Virgin Mary, 185, 186; his abuse of The Protestant, 193; his life of Saint Wenefride, 199, 201—205; other works published by, 206: Referred to, 255, Note; notice of his school book, 475.—See CATHOLIC VINDICATOR.
Angel-worship, lawfulness of praying to angels discussed, 657.
Ann, St, mother of the Virgin Mary, account of, 183.
Antichrist, a subject of ancient prophecy, 834; illustration of several passages in the Old Testament as applicable to, 835—839; other passages in the New Testament, 842—844· means by which antichrist will be destroyed, 844.
Apostles' Creed, notice of the, 629; its antiquity and orthodoxy, 630; the question of its being a composition of the apostles handed down by tradition, considered, 775, 776.
Apostolic Chancery, the tax of the, noticed, 619.
Apostolic Headship, no evidence of, 421—424.
Apostolic Succession, incidentally handled, 427, 428; claim of the popish priests to be true successors of the apostles discussed, 650, 651; "Apostolicity," Dr Milner's fourth mark of the True Church, not applicable to the Church of Rome, 813; short account of Apostolic churches, ib., 814; Apostolic character of Christian pastors contrasted with that of the Popish clergy, 814, 815; doctrine of the Church of Rome opposed to that of the apostolic churches, 815—819; the apostolical succession of the clergy shown to be a mere figment, 820, 821; Dr. Milner's apostolic tree described, 823.
Apostolicity. See APOSTOLICAL SUCCESSION.
Argyle, Countess of, censured by the General Assembly for countenancing Popery, 102, 103.
Atonement, Scripture doctrine of the, stated and illustrated, versus the sacrifice of the mass, 278—281; the same versus confession and penance, 397—400.
Augustin, St, quoted, 421, 497.
Auto-da-fe, account of an, 536.

B

Baher, Father, extracts from his work on the mass, 275 and 289, and 293—295.
Baptism, Popish views of, 72.
Beaghan, James, confession of, 695.
Beatification, definition of, 212.
Becket, Thomas à, appearance of the Virgin to, 195.
Belfast, a correspondent's remarks on the manner in which Popery is treated by many Protestants in, 363, 364.
Belgium, doctrinal decision of the bishops of, 87, 88.
Bells, account of the baptism of, in Canada, 316—318.
Berington and Kirk's work in support of the Catholic religion referred to, 572 and 573; character of the work, and some of its propositions commented on, 599—606.
Beuno, St, notice of, 200 and 206.
Beziers, city of, inhabitants put to the sword as heretics or Waldenses, 520.
Beziers, earl of, endeavours to protect the Albigenses from the persecutions of the Pope's legate, 520; foiled at the siege of Carcassone, 521, 522.
Bible, authority of the, with Papists, 44, 45; tax proposed on reading the, 79; practice of the Romish church in withholding the Bible from the people, 143; denied by the Rev. Andrew Scott, 144; and Amicus Veritatis, 145; answered by The Protestant, ib. et seq. ad 176; early translations of the, 148; Wickliffe's, ib.; Luther's, 149; Pope Sixtus V.'s, ib.; Italian mutilated edition, 150; Rhemish translation, 152; proposed society for circulating the Douay Bible, 156, 157; Bible addressed to all, 160, et seq.; opposed by Popish writers, 162—168; reflections on the general circulation of the, 168—171; hostility to the, in Spain, 173; in Ireland, ib., 174; effects of reading the Bible and preaching, 175, 176; English translation of the, 198 and note; Bishop Copinger on the use of the, in schools, 404; resolutions by the Popish clergy of Cloyne and Ross against the reading of the, in schools, 405; Daniel O'Connell's speech against the use of the, in schools, 406, 407; remarks on, 407, 408; examples of absurd interpretations of the, by Popish divines, 410, 411; sufficiency of the, as a rule of faith, 549, and 551, 552; held by Papists as secondary to the authority of the church, 552; arguments of Papists that we owe to the authority of the Church, our knowledge of the genuineness of the, 552; aversion of Papists to the general circulation of the, 553, 554; instances of alleged corruptions in the early translations of the, 555; how a Christian knows the Bible to be the word of God independently of human tradition, 556—560; errors in the Pope's edition of the, 560; the Church of Rome guilty of withholding the, from the common people, 646; this defended by the Catholic Vindicator, ib., 647; aversion of the Papists generally to the free use of the, 648—650; question as to the difficulty of understanding the, ib.; beneficial effects of reading the, 654; subject of the, taken as a rule of faith, discussed, 753—756; doctrine of Papists that the Bible alone is not a sufficient rule of faith, 756; the same subject enlarged on, 757—761; the Church of Rome claims the exclusive right of explaining the, 784; injunction of "searching the Scriptures" explained, 785; "the Church proves the Bible and the Bible proves the Church," 787.

Bible Schools, bull of the Pope against, in Ireland, 347; commented on, 348—350.

Bible Society, denounced by the Pope, 79; its practice in distributing the Scriptures, 145; ridiculed in the Orthodox Journal, 151; bull of the Pope against Bible Societies, 158.

Bigotry, Phillips on, 31; definition of the term, 76; instances of, among the Papists, 76—79.

Blindness, counterfeited to perform a sham miracle, 224.

Blood, question as to the Mosaic law against eating of, 781, 782; the obligation of the law not abolished by tradition, ib.

Bogue, Dr, of Gosport, his translation of the French catechism noticed, 618.

Bonaparte, blessed and crowned by the Pope, 444; excommunicated by the same, 445—450; historic doubts as to the existence of, 674.

Books, censorship of, 68.

Bossuet, Bishop of Meaux, his effrontery in denying the persecutions of Popery, 540; argues the lawfulness of persecution, 542.

Bourdeaux, persecution of Protestants at, 74, 75.

Bourke, Rev. Charles, a Romish priest in Ireland, his case, 117, 118; his pamphlet noticed by the Catholic Vindicator, 634, 635.

Bower, Alexander, extracts from his Lives of the Popes, 437—440.

Bradley, Rev. Patrick, a Presbyterian minister, letter giving an account of his conversion from Popery, 377—382.

Britain, Popery not the original Christianity of, 744.

Brothels, Pope's bull for licensing, 89.

Brownlee, Dr, quotation from his letters on the Roman Catholic controversy, 63; Parable from do., 64—68.

Brunswick, duke of, his Reasons for preferring the Roman Catholic Religion, 77; notice of his "Fifty Reasons for preferring the Roman Catholic Religion to all other sects," 767, 768.

Buchanan, George, anecdote by, of a baker, painter, and priest, 269, n.; translation from his Franciscan by the Rev. Mr Graham, 347 and 366.

Bulls, Papal. Bull granted to the family of Kilravack, 14 and 20; do. granted to the people of Cork, 18; do. for exciting rebellion in Ireland, ib.; Bull for extirpating the Waldenses, 41; Pope's bull for licensing brothels, 89; Bull of the Pope against Bible Societies, 158; Bull of the Pope against "Bible Schools" in Ireland, 347; commented on, 348—350; Bull of Pope Urban VIII. granting plenary indulgence to such Irish Papists as should extirpate their Protestant neighbours, 511; Bull of Indulgence, copy of, with translation, granted to a family, conferring upon an individual the power of granting a dispensation, &c., 607. See INDULGENCES.

C

Calvin, John, his share of blame in the burning of Servetus, 543; Dr Milner's mutilated extracts from the writings of, 797, 798.

Cameron, Bishop, his examination in the case, Scott v. M'Gavin, 728.

Cameron, Rev. Robert, letter from, giving case of a Romish husband not keeping faith with his Protestant wife, 311.

Candles, used alike in Popish and Pagan worship, 300.

Canisius, Peter, his Catechism, 96.

Canonization, Popish, its resemblance to heathen deification, 213; process of, 215.

Carcassone, a town of Piedmont, inhabited by a number of Albigenses, 520; besieged by the Pope's legate and a vast army, 520—522.

Carlisle, Rev. James, extract from a pamphlet by, 331—334.

Catechism, different Catholic catechisms compared, 94—96.

Catholic, term CATHOLIC distinguished from PAPIST, 14 and 17 and 40; distinction between the words CATHOLIC, POPISH, and POPERY, 627, 628; meaning of the term, 811; not originally used in the Apostles' Creed, ib.

Catholic Emancipation, adverted to, 180; The Protestant's opinion of, 359; consequences of Papists getting into Parliament, 452; probable number of Catholic members were Catholic Emancipation granted, 456; letter on the subject of, 495; petition of an Independent Church in Cockermouth for, 574; copy of the same, ib. n.; remarks on, ib.; reasons why Papists should not hold situations of power and trust, 645, 646; the subject of, introduced, 688; exclusion from places of power not persecution, 689; acts passed after the revolution against Papists, 690; relaxation of former acts, and concessions made, ib. and 691; effect of such concessions, ib. and 693; aim of Papists to recover church lands and forfeited estates, 693—695; the primitive Christians did not aspire at civil power, 697; proofs that Papists wish to subvert the established government in church and state, 698—700; dangers of admitting Papists to power in a Protestant state, 701—704; argument for emancipation from the fact that Papists are eligible to all places in the United States of America, answered, 715—719; notice of the various motions respecting it, in Parliament, 845, n.

Catholic Vindicator, (see ANDREWS, W. E.) first notice of the publication so called, 143; further notice of, 178; maintains the lawfulness of breaking faith, ib., 179; its opinion of the Bible, 181; its abuse of The Protestant, 193; account of the demise of the, 344—346; quoted on the subject of the sufficiency of the Bible as a rule of faith, 552—555; its instances of alleged corruptions in the early translations of the Bible, 555; its defence of Amicus Veritatis from the charge of forgery, 619; its accusations against Luther on the subject of divorce, 620; commencement of regular reply to the, 623; character of the work, ib. et seq.; some of its accusations refuted and absurdities exposed, 624—626; it admits the use of the terms PAPIST and POPERY, 627; it asserts that Christianity owes its rise to the influence of Popery, 632; its allegation that Popery is more favourable to good morals than Protestantism, discussed, 633, 634; falsely accuses the Covenanters of undertaking to extirpate all Papists by force of arms, 635; affirms the gunpowder-plot to be a mere invention of the Protestants, 636, 637; its remarks on the Pope crowning Napoleon, 637; its acknowledgments as to the doctrine of Papists not keeping faith with heretics, 638—642; its slanderous language against The Protestant quoted and exposed, 643; it defends the Church of Rome in withholding the Bible from the free use of the people, 646, 647; its defence of saint-worship, 654; its arguments answered, 658—662; its defence of the adoration of the virgin, 668, 669; St Winefride supposed to be a favourite saint of the, 670, 671; its manner of treating the Man-in-the-Wynd story, 673—675; its views of justification by faith, 676, 677; its defence of the Church of Rome against the charge of falsehood, 677—679; its defence of Transubstantiation, 679—681, and 682—685; reasons of The Protestant for replying to the Vindicator so fully, 681; it accuses The Protestant of forgery and misquotation, 684—688; conclusion of The Protestant's reply to, 688.

Catholicity, claimed by the Church of Rome, proved not to belong to her, 811, 812.

Catholics, number of, in England and their rank, 457, 458; number of, in Glasgow, 460.

Celibacy of the Romish priests, 77; introduction to the subject of, 480; doctrine of, as laid down by Bishop Hay, ib., 481; answered, ib., 482—485; the arguments of Popish writers in favour of, exposed, ib. et seq.; historical account of the establishment of, in the Romish church, 486, 487; immoralities occasioned by, 487, 488; anecdotes relating to, 493, Notes.

Censorship of books by the Roman priesthood, 68.

Ceremonies, Popish ceremonies practised at Havannah, 244.

Chaise, Father la, his project for extirpating heretics, 840—842.

Challoner's "Garden of the Soul," extracts from, 383—386.

Chalmers, Rev. Dr, his evidence of the Christian Revelation referred to, 552.

Chancery, Apostolic. See Apostolic Chancery.

Charity, estimate of, by Amicus Veritatis, 92; true nature of, ib.

Chastity, not inconsistent with the marriage relation, 484.

Christ, the true head of the Church, 54; the only true satisfaction for sin, 397—400.

Christianity, introduction of, into Britain, 459.

Chronicle, Glasgow, (newspaper) paragraph in, regarding Oratorio, 11 and 35; letters to the editor of the, from 'A Protestant,' 'Amicus Veritatis,' and 'Pax,' 12—32; to the readers of the, 33.

Church, Dr Milner's marks of the true, 789. See Rome, Church of.

Clarendon, Lord, extracts from his work "Religion and Policy," on the Pope's supremacy, 431, and 433—436.

Cleland, Dr. See Glasgow.

Clergy, Romish, profligacy of the, 487—492.

Cobbett, William, cited by the Catholic Vindicator, 676.

Cockburn, Mr, (now Lord Cockburn,) remarks on his speech in the Jury Trial, Scott v. M'Gavin, 720—737.

Cockermouth, in Cumberland, petition of an Independent church in, for Catholic Emancipation, 574 and n.

Commandment, the Second, omitted or altered in Catholic catechisms, 95.

Commandments, Ten, mutilated by the Church of Rome, 217.

Conciliation, the rage of the day, 832.

Concubinage, allowed to the Romish priests, 489.

Confession, auricular, subject introduced, 366; doctrine of the council of Trent regarding, 367; duties of, according to Gother, 368; of venial and mortal sins, 368—370, 375, 376; instructions and devotions for confession, 383, 384; what is required to a good confession, 385; the method of confession, ib.; pernicious effects of, upon the minds of priests, 389; and the people, ib.—392; children's confession turned to a farce, 392; Da Costa's testimony regarding confession, 393; passages of Scripture adduced in favour of confession, 394—396; subject of satisfaction for sin intimately connected with that of confession, 397.

Confiteor, copy of the, 390.

Constantinople, patriarch of, assumes the title of universal bishop, 437.

Convents, description of, in Montreal, 318, 319; notice of one in London, 741.

Conversion, account of the conversion of a family in Ireland from Popery, 478, 479; pretended death-bed conversions to the Church of Rome, 765—768; character of Popish conversions of the heathen, 824, 825; death-bed conversions to Popery, 826—830; remarks on, 830, 831.

Copinger, Bishop, his address to the Catholic clergy of the diocese of Cloyne and Ross, 404; remarks on, 409—412, 413—415.

Cork, indulgence granted to the people of, 18.

Covenanters, falsely accused by the Catholic Vindicator of undertaking to extirpate all Papists by force of arms, 635.

Crabs, ridiculous imposition of crabs being made to represent souls freed from purgatory, 336.

Craig, Mr John, some time colleague of John Knox, extracts from the life of, 471.

Creed of Pope Pius IV., 443, 444.

Creed, Apostles'. See Apostles' Creed.

Cross, image of the, in Catholic worship, idolatrous, 301, 302.

Crucifixes, indulgences granted to Stukley's, 110, 111.

Culpa and Pœna, (guilt and punishment) distinction of Popish writers between, 43.

Cunningham, Mr, his work on the apostacy of the Church of Rome quoted, 217 and 219, n.

Cup, on withholding the cup from the laity in the holy sacrament, 273, 274.

Cutty Stool, practice of exhibition in the, adopted by the Scottish church for fornication, 102; subject of money taken for exemption from the, discussed, ib. 103, 104.

D

Da Costa, a Portuguese gentleman, his testimony regarding confession, 393.

Dallas, Mr, his defence of the Jesuits noticed, 584.

Daly, James, affidavit of, giving an account of a forcible attempt in Galway to convert a dying man to Popery, 828—830.

Daniel, allusion to his prophecy regarding Antichrist, 838, 839.

Derwentwater, Lord, anecdote of, 248.

D'Espence, Claude, a Parisian divine, quoted, 22, 26.

Dick, Rev. Dr, his Essay on the Inspiration of the Scriptures referred to, 552.

Dominic, St, worship paid to the image of, 222; account of, 223.

Douay Catechism, adverted to, 12, 13, 19; quoted, 24, 37, 42, 48; character of the, 94—96; on the doctrine of the mass, 274; Douay Catechism on purgatory, 324; discussed, 327, et seq.

Dromgoole, Rev. Dr, extracts from his speeches on Catholic Emancipation, 698, 699.

Drummond, Dr, controversy between him and bishop Hay on the subject of breaking faith with heretics, 136—138.

Dublin, account of a Purgatorian Society in, or society for raising money to relieve from purgatory, 331—334; card to the members of, 344.
Dulia, a kind of worship, 196.
Dupin, his testimony regarding indulgences, 21 and 22.
Durham, bishop of, controversy between the, and some English Papists, 472.

E

Education, method of, pursued in Catholic schools, 475; bull of the Pope against educational schools in Ireland, with comments, 347—350; archbishop of Tuam's charge regarding the same, 346 and 350—362.
Elizabeth, Queen of England, excommunication of by the Pope, 108, 109; the Pope's letter to the earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland exciting them to rebellion against, 110; plots of Jesuits against her life, 111; Queen Elizabeth, tested on the subject of the real presence, 267.
Emancipation. See CATHOLIC EMANCIPATION.
England, number of Catholics in, and their rank, 457, 458, 461.
England, Rev. Mr, his treasonable catechism on Irish history, 832—834.
Episcopalians, (Scottish) disabilities to which they were subject in the last century, 700.
Erskine, Thomas, recommendation of a pamphlet by, on the Internal Evidence of Revealed Religion, 558.
Eucharist, Douay Catechism on the, 48; Eucharist, or sacrament of the Lord's Supper, explained, 248, et seq.; Gother on the Eucharist, 260. See TRANSUBSTANTIATION and MASS.
Excommunication, singular case of, 52, 53; excommunication in the Romish Church, 106—110; examples of, in the cases of King John, Queen Elizabeth, and Henry VIII., 106—111; excommunication of rats, mice, &c., 112, 113; used as an instrument of oppression against private individuals, 115, 116; excommunication of the Rev. Charles Bourke, 117; copy of the excommunication of Napoleon by Pope Pius VII., 445—450.
Extreme Unction, doctrine of, as laid down by bishop Hay, 564, 565 and 570; the subject discussed, 565—571; shown to have no foundation in Scripture in the sense in which Papists use it, ib., unknown to the Christians of the early ages, 571.

F

Fair-Dealing, letter from a Friend to, 362; second letter from, 400—402; remarks on, 402—404; another letter from a Friend to, 493; remarks on, ib., 494.
Faith, act of, copy of the Popish, 759; called FIDES CARBONARIA or the collier's faith, 761, n. See BIBLE, POPERY, and RELIGION. On keeping faith with heretics. See HERETICS. Meaning of the phrase, "modes of faith," discussed, 579. Justification by faith. See JUSTIFICATION.
Fathers, remarks on the genuineness of the writings of the, 550, 551.
Feet. See WASHING OF FEET.
Fever, Typhus, case of a priest attending a man labouring under, 653; efforts of The Protestant and other gentlemen in Glasgow in subduing, ib.
Fillans, St, famed waters of, 322.
Flagellantes, or self-whippers, penance of the, 303.
Fornication, laws against, 103.
France, persecutions of the early reformers of, 80—82.
Franciscan, translation from Buchanan's, 347 and 366.

G

Galileo, account of his persecution by the Inquisition for teaching that the earth moves round the sun, 525—527; his abjuration of the Copernican system, 527.
Gandolphy, Rev. Mr, his defence of Transubstantiation, 683.
Gavin, Rev. Mr, extracts from his Master-key to Popery, 334, 335, 337, 390—392, 393.
Geddes, Dr, his distinction between the words POPERY and CATHOLIC, 623.
Glasgow, means by which the Glasgow Catholic chapel was built, 27; James Retby, an early reformer, burnt at, in 1422, 84; trial of the Lollards of Kyle at, ib., Hieronymus Russel and Kennedy tried and burnt at, in 1538, 86; relics that formerly belonged to the cathedral of Glasgow, 241; money raised for building the Glasgow Catholic chapel, 313, 314; number of Catholics in Glasgow, 460; comparative morality of Protestants and Papists in, 672; calculations regarding the number of Catholics and contributors to the building of the Catholic chapel in, their amount of subscription, &c., 721—737; instances of converts from the Protestant to the Popish faith among the population of, unknown or very rare, 765, 766; Glasgow Cathedral, the only entire one remaining in Scotland, 812; genuine Protestant doctrine preached there, ib.
God, love to, the foundation of religion, 370; not held indispensable by Papists, 371—373.
Good Works, the subject of, explained, 676, 677.
Gordon, Captain, the originator of Catholic schools in Glasgow, 733, 734.
Gordon, Mr, an Aberdeenshire gentleman, converted from Popery, 389; his testimony regarding confession, ib. and 390.
Gother, Mr, quoted on purgatory, 325; quoted on satisfaction for sin, 399; extracts from his work on confession, 368.
Graham, Rev. John, Lifford, letter from, enclosing translation from Buchanan's Franciscan, 347, and 366; poem by, recommended, 377; his Annals of Ireland quoted, 538, 539; 'An old story versified,' by, 606.
Greenock, The Protestant read publicly in a meeting house in, 720, 721.
Gregory, Pope, the Great, condemns the title of universal bishop assumed by the patriarch of Constantinople, 436—438; countenances the treason of Phocas, 438.
Grey, Earl, speech of, in the House of Lords on transubstantiation, 265; remarks on, 266.
Grier, Rev. Richard, his work in answer to Dr Milner's "End of Religious Controversy" referred to, 719; his remarks on Dr Milner on miracles, 808.
Gunpowder-plot, said by the Catholic Vindicator to be a mere invention of the Protestants, 636, 637.

H

Halliday, B., story of, 823—830.
Hamilton, Patrick, account of his martyrdom, 85.
Havannah, island of Cuba, letter from, giving an account of Popish ceremonies practised there, 244.
Hay, Bishop, controversy with Dr Drummond on the subject of breaking faith with heretics, 136—138; extract from his "Sincere Christian" on Confession, 394—396; his arguments for Peter's supremacy, 429, 430; and for the headship of the Pope, 441—443; his doctrine on the subject of clerical celibacy, 480—485; his vindication of the Catholic clergy from the charge of licentious-ness, 488, 489; extracts from his work on the doctrine of Extreme Unction, 564, 565, and 570.

Head of the church, subject of the, discussed, 53—55.
Headship, the church of Christ hath no visible, 430, 431.
Henry VIII., excommunication of, 110; his application to the pope to dissolve his first marriage, 616.
Henry, Dr, extracts from his History, 490.
Heresy, its undefinable nature, 524; inquisition instituted to discover and punish, ib. and 525.
Heretics, the subject of keeping faith with, discussed, 125—139; lawfulness of breaking faith with them proved by several authorities, 126 and 128; recognized by the Council of Trent, 127; modern Papists ashamed of the doctrine, 132 and 136; maintained by many Popish writers, 137; recent cases of, 139—142; on the doctrine of Papists keeping faith with, 638—642; law of the church of Rome with regard to, 702—704.
Hervey, Rev. James, quoted as an authority regarding holy places, 15 and 26, 27.
Heth, Thomas, a Jesuit, story of, 533.
Hibernian Society. See SCHOOLS.
Highlands, popish superstitions in the, 322, 323; letter from a Papist in the, to his son in Glasgow, 718, 719.
Hocus-pocus, a corruption of the words Hoc est corpus used in the Eucharist, 249.
Hodgson, Rev. Dr of Blantyre, his sermon referred to, 461 and 646.
Hogan, Rev. Wm. a priest in America, his case, 713.
Holy Places, subject of discussed, 12—15, 26, 27.
Horses, benediction of, with holy water, at Rome, 299, 300.
Host, adoration of the, 261; respect paid by the British Ambassador at Paris to the, 264; forms of prayers used at the adoration of the, 268—270; alleged miracles performed by the, 271—273; corruption of the, 295; story of a dog swallowing the, 296.
Huss, John, safe-conduct granted to, violated, 129—131.
Hyperdulia, a kind of worship, 196.

I

Idolatry, introduction to the subject of Popish, 181; (the subject continued through several Numbers, to which references are made, under Saint-worship, images, worship of, Virgin Mary, &c. See from pages 182—224.) Conformity of Romish idolatry with that of the ancient heathens, 297—304; worship of idols disclaimed by a Catholic correspondent (W. D.) 304—306; answered, 306—310; Papists by their saint-worship guilty of, 654—658.
Ignotus, extracts from the letters of, 304.
Images, worship of, 217; proved idolatrous, 218; authorities for, 218—220; subject of, continued, 221; miraculous power ascribed to, 222.
Incense, use of, in the Roman and Pagan worship, 298.
Index Expurgatorius of the Catholic church, 287.
Indulgences, remarks on, 12, 13; indulgences said to have been granted by Luther, 15 and 23 and 39, 40; bull of indulgences circulated by Tetzel, 18; do. granted to the people of Cork, ib.; do. to Ireland, ib.; explanation of indulgences from the modern French catechism, 19; subject of indulgences discussed, 21—26 and 42—44; indulgences granted by the Pope for thousands of years, 36; Douay Catechism on penance and indulgence, 24 and 37, 38; doctrine of, discussed, 98—102; calculated to encourage the commission of sin, ib.; the doctrine of Christ the reverse of this, ib.; difference between a popish indulgence and the practice of exacting money in the Scottish church for fornication, 102—105; indulgences granted to Stukley's crucifixes, 110, 111; indulgences to the kings and queens of France, 124; the arguments of Amicus Veritatis about indulgences and dispensations answered, 616—619.
Infallibility of the Pope, 50—52, 57, 58; Dr Porteous on, 138; on the infallibility of the Pope, 442; does not imply foreknowledge, 444.
Inquisition, the subject of the, introduced, 516; first established in the twelfth century for the extirpation of the Albigenses and Waldenses, 517; origin and growth of the, 524; the discovery and punishment of heresy, the object of the institution, ib.; account of its persecution of Galileo, 525; breaking up of the, at Saragosa, by the French soldiers, 528; sixty young women found in the keeping of the holy fathers of the, 529; singular narrative of one of them, 530—533; mode of recruiting the holy seraglio, 533; cases of cruelty perpetrated by the, 534, 535.
Intolerance, instances of Popish intolerance and persecution, 78—90.
Ireland, case of excommunication in, 116; character and conduct of Popish priests in, 117—120; opposition of the priests in, to the Bible, 173, 174; superstitions practised at Holy Wells in, 245—248; method of raising money among the Papists in, 314, 315; superstitions practised in, 320, 321; sums paid in, for masses for the dead, 291 and 338; interference of the Pope with the civil affairs of Ireland, 348; appeal of the Catholic Board of, to the Pope, 352; circulation of "The Protestant" in, 346 and 363; bull of the Pope against Bible Schools in, 347—350; Archbishop of Tuam's charge on the same subject, 350—362; extracts from letters on the state of, 511—515; influence of the priesthood there, ib.; account of the massacre of the Protestants in, 538, 539; letter from J. A. on the state of Popery in, 560—563; another letter from, describing the state of Popery in, 596—599 and 612, 614; comparative morality of Protestants and Papists in, 673; concessions made to the Papists in Ireland no effect in satisfying or conciliating them, 690—693; murderous hostility of Papists against Protestants in, 695, 696; account of a young lady in, taking the veil, 740, 741; Popery not the original Christianity of, 745; forcible attempt in, to convert a dying man to Popery, 828—830; remarks on, 830, 831; treasonable character of a "Sketch of Irish History" introduced into Roman Catholic Schools, 832—834; people of, taught from infancy to hate the people and government of England, 834; state of, 844.
Irenæus, St, The Protestant accused of mis-quoting, 686, 687.
Irishman, letter from an, 495.

J

James, Saint, account of the liturgy of, 661.
Jamieson, William, his Roma Racoviana quoted, 816—818.
Jeffrey, Mr, (now Lord Jeffrey,) references to his speech in the Jury Trial, Scott v. M'Gavin, 725, 726 and 738.
Jerusalem, the mother church of the apostles, 813.
Jesuits, secret instructions of the Society of, 141, 142; countenanced by British Papists and the Orthodox Journal, 371 and 376; Pascal's representations of their errors, 371, 372; doctrines of, relieves men from the obligation of loving God and their neighbours, ib. and 373—376; extract of a letter relating to them and The Protestant, 571—573; efforts of, in Lancashire, ib., 574; extract from another letter relating to the, 575; letter relating to an anti-Jesuit society in Preston, 576; remarks on the proceedings of the Jesuits there, 577; impudence of the, in naming themselves from Jesus, 580; sketch of the rise, progress, character, and power of the, 580—583; Dallas's defence of the, noticed, 584; account of the decline and fall of the order, 584, 585; restoration of the order, 586; Secreta Monita, or secret rules of the Jesuits, 588—591; remarks on, 592; intrigues of the Jesuits, 592—594; their oath of secrecy, 595; their efforts in France, 793.

John, King, of England, excommunication of, by the Pope, 106—108.

Jones, his History of the Waldenses quoted, 520—523.

Justification by faith, 502, 503; the fundamental doctrine of the Reformation, 506, 507; the subject of, treated, 676, 677.

Justin, St, The Protestant accused of mis-quoting, 685, 686.

Juvenis, letter from, 496—499; remarks on, 499—501; second letter from, quoted and commented on, 543—551.

K

Kames, Lord, extract from his work, 296.

Kelly, Dr. See Tuam, archbishop of.

Keys, power of the—to whom did Christ commit the keys of the kingdom of heaven? 423, 424.

Kilravock, bull of the Pope granted to the family of, 14 and 20, 22 and 36.

Knox, John, his History quoted, 84.

L

Lamb, Joseph, miracle alleged to be wrought on him, 809.

Lamps, burning of, at Romish altars and images, a Pagan ceremony, 300.

Lancashire, efforts of the Jesuits in, 574—576.

Lanigan, Bishop, his five reasons for breaking faith, 140; adverted to, 179; further account of his reasons for breaking faith with heretics, 476.

Latria, a kind of worship, 196.

Lent, method of keeping, by some priests in Ireland, 515.

Liberals, remarks on the manner in which popery is treated by, 364.

Limborch, his History of the Inquisition quoted, 518, 519; his character, ib.; his History quoted, 525, et seq.

Liturgies, notice of the liturgy of St James and other pretended ancient liturgies, 661, 662.

Lollards of Kyle tried at Glasgow, 84.

London, notice of a convent of nuns in, 741.

Lord's Supper, sacrament of the, explained, 248, et seq. See Transubstantiation. Exposition of Christ's words on instituting the, 252—254; forms of prayers used at the, by Papists, 268—270. See Mass.

Loretto, Lady of, holy image of the, 300.

Louis XVIII., king of France, his prayer for the duke of Bordeaux, 615.

Loyola, Ignatius, founder of the order of the Jesuits, strange stories regarding him, 580; compared to Luther, 582.

Luther, indulgences said to have been granted by, 15 and 23 and 39, 40; his German translation of the Bible, 149; bull against, ib.; passages from his writings, 463; accused of abolishing the obligation of Good Works, 501 and 504; false accusations brought against, 504; his views on justification by faith, 505—507; his doctrine and life, 509; absurd stories in relation to his death, 510; his alleged conferences with the devil, 511; his doctrine on the subject of divorce, explained and defended, 619—621; Dr Milner's mutilated extracts from the writings of, 797, 798.

Lynde, Sir Humphrey, extract from his work Via tuta et via devia, 411.

Lyons, persecution at, in the twelfth century, 79, 80.

M

MacHardy, Mr, interview with The Protestant regarding the story of the Man in the Wynd, 225—232; referred to, 255, note; reference to, with certificate in his favour, as given in the Catholic Vindicator, 675.

Man-in-the-Wynd. See Wynd.

Manchester, liberality of Protestants there, in contributing to the building of a Catholic chapel, 578; remarks on, 579.

Marcellinus, Pope, idolatry of, 434, 435.

Margaret, queen of Malcolm Canmore, instrumental in establishing Popery in Scotland, 83.

Marriage, evil and danger of Protestants marrying Papists, 311; illustrated by cases, ib., 312, 313; inconsistency of Catholics making marriage a sacrament, and denying it to the priesthood, 492. See Celibacy.

Martyrs, veneration for the memory of, degenerating into saint-worship, 663.

Mass, doctrine of the, as laid down by the Douay Catechism and the French Catechism, 274, 275; explained by Father Baker, 275; decree of the Council of Trent concerning, 276; fundamental errors of the doctrine, 277, 278; atonement of Christ opposed to the sacrifice of the, 278—281; examination of alleged Scripture authorities in support of the mass, 282—288; sums paid for masses for the dead, 291, 292; vestments used in celebrating mass, 293; rules for celebrating mass, 296

Maynooth College for educating Catholic priests, remarks on the establishment of, 614.

Mediators, popish priests affect to be mediators between God and the people, 289—291.

Melchisedec, priesthood of, argument regarding the, in favour of the mass examined, 282—286.

Middleton, Dr, extracts from his letter from Rome, showing the conformity of Popery with Paganism, 297—304.

Milner, Dr, bishop of Castabala and vicar apostolic of the midland district of England, opposed to the circulation of the Scriptures, 166—169; his work, "The End of Religious Controversy," referred to, 719; commencement of answer to, 742; general character of, ib.; remarks on his address to the bishop of St David's, 742, 743; his assumption of the antiquity of Popery proved to be erroneous, 744—746; his club of worthy Christians examined and analyzed, 747—749; his method of finding out the true religion exposed, 749—752; his account of the extravagances of enthusiasts whom he classes as belonging to the Protestant faith, 753; his second rule of finding out the true religion, ib.; his misrepresentation of the Bible as a rule of faith, 754—757; his cavil that Protestants cannot be sure of what they believe, answered, 757—761; his shuffling mode of arguing, 761; his false representation of true religion, 762; his admission of differences existing in the Romish Church regarding the immaculate conception of the Virgin, 763; his pretended death-bed conversions to the Church of Rome, 765—768; his true rule of faith discussed, 769—776; his instances of Protestants being guided by tradition, 778—783; he claims for the Church of Rome the exclusive right of explaining the Bible, 784; his marks of the true church, 789; his second mark of the true church (sanctity) proved not to belong to the Church of Rome, 795, 796; his gross misrepresentation of Protestant doctrine, 797; his charge of Socinianism against the Church of Scotland answered, 798, 799; his erroneous exposition of the doctrine of the Church of Rome, as opposed to that of Protestant churches, 799, 800; his comparison of the holiness of individuals, 801; his relation of Popish miracles, 807—811; his third mark of the true church (Catholicity) not sustained, 811, 812; his fourth mark (Apostolicity) discussed, 813 and 820—822; his views as to the authority of the Bible identified with those of Dr Priestley, 818, 819; his Apostolic Tree described, 823; his views of conversion, 824, 825; part third of his work noticed, 825; his letter on Papal supremacy, 825, 826.

Milton, John, as author of Paradise Lost, taken in illustration of the tradition of written testimony, 777; his sonnet on the persecution of the Waldenses quoted, 840.

Miracle, wonderful, recorded by St Anselm, 45.

Miracles, account of, claimed by the Romish Church, 807—811; miracles of St Francis Xavier, 807, 808; office in Rome for recording and trying miracles, 811.

Moncreif, Mr, (now Lord Moncreif,) reference to his speech in the Jury Trial, Scott v. M'Gavin, 720 and 732.

Money, raising of, the great object of Popery, 337, 338.

Montreal, ceremony of baptizing bells at, 316, 317; description of convents at, 318, 319.

Montserrat, origin of the convent of, 667.

Morning Post, extracts from letters in the, 262, 263.

Morrissy, Rev. L., parish priest in Ireland, extracts from his "Development of the Inquisitorial System of the Church of Rome in Ireland," 701—708; statement of his case, 706, 707; remarks on, 708, 709; further extracts, 710, 711; further remarks, 712.

Moses, discussion regarding his reception of the law of God on Mount Sinai, 647, 648.

Musselburgh, alleged miracle at, 224.

N

Nantz, revocation of the edict of, 540; its consequences, ib.

Neighbour, love to our, dispensed with, by the Jesuits, 373—376.

Northumberland, Earl of, excited to rebellion by the Pope, 110

Nunneries, description of, in Montreal, 318, 319. See CONVENT.

O

Oath, form of, required by James I., 121; by William III., 122; form at present (1818) in force, 123

O'Connell, Daniel, letter of, inclosing plan for raising subscriptions among the Catholics, 315; extract from a speech of his, 358; his speech against the use of the Bible in schools, 406, 407; remarks on, 407, 408, 413, 414; letter commenting on O'Connell's speech, 415, 416.

Oratorio, subjects of the, performed at the Roman Catholic chapel, Glasgow, 11; notice of the, in Glasgow Chronicle, ib.; animadversions on said notice in a letter from "A Protestant," 12; reply by Amicus Veritatis, ib.; also by Pax, 14; answers by The Protestant, 13, et seq.

Origen, St, The Protestant accused of misquoting, 687.

Orthodox Journal quoted, 78, 90, 112, 116, 135, 151, 154, 157, 165, 167, 170, 323; extracts from the, regarding the Jesuits, 587.

Ossian, the poems ascribed to, used in illustration of the subject of tradition, 777, 778.

Owen, Dr John, quotation from a work of his, 794.

P

Paganism, conformity of popery with, 297—304.

Papist, term of "Papist" objected to by Pax, 14; defended by The Protestant, 16 and 40; a papist's manner of spending a day, 69, 70; the term PAPIST applied to a Roman Catholic admitted by the Catholic Vindicator, 627; Dr Geddes's distinction between CATHOLIC and PAPIST, 628.

Parable of Saint Peter and Antichrist, 65—68.

Paris, notice of the massacre of the Protestants at, 537.

Parliament, consequences of Papists getting into, 452; probable number of Catholic members, 456.

Pascal, M. extracts from his "Provincial Letters" on the errors of the Jesuits, 371, 372.

Paul, St, misrepresentations of, by the Rhemish translators, 288.

Pax, letters from, 14 and 20; answers to, 16, 29 and 35.

Penance, practice of the Romish church regarding, 21; doctrine of the Council of Trent regarding, 367; taken as a satisfaction for sin, 399, 400.

Pepin, king, usurpation of, to the throne of France, countenanced by the Pope, 439; he assists the Pope to temporal sovereignty, 440.

Persecution, instances of Popish, 73—75 and 78—90; number who have perished through Popish, 353, note; false complaints of, by the Irish Papists, 352—354; the genius of Christianity hostile to, 516; persecution of the primitive Christians, 516; instances of persecution by Protestants, 542; the bishop of Meaux argues the lawfulness of, ib.; burning of Servetus by the republic of Geneva, 543.

Peter, Saint, his alleged supremacy, 57—60; question of his ever having been at Rome, 61; never Bishop of Rome, ib., 76; parable of Saint Peter and Antichrist, 65—68; letter to The Protestant on the subject of his supremacy, 416—420; criticism on the words "Thou art Peter," 417; Peter's unstable and versatile character, ib.; also his boldness and ardour, 422; his supremacy further discussed, 420—424; no evidence of his being appointed head of the apostles, 421, 422; to whom did Christ commit the keys of the kingdom of heaven? 423, 424; table of St Peter, or chronology of his life, by the Rhemish translators, 425; no evidence of his ever having been at Rome, ib., 426, 427; was not bishop of Rome, 427; place and manner of his death unknown, ib., 428; the headship of Peter further discussed, 428—431; his supposed successors, 432; Juvenis on the supremacy of, 543, 544; not the rock on which Christ built his church, 629; the infirmity of his character, ib.

Petros, meaning of the word as applied to Simon Peter, 417, 418; Juvenis on the word, and Peter's supremacy, 543.

Philadelphia, bishop of, curious pastoral charge by the, 713—715.

Philips, Charles, passage by, on bigotry, 31; adverted to, 45.

Philopatris extracts from letters of, in the Morning Post, 262, 263.

Phocas, Emperor, procures the title of universal bishop to be transferred from the patriarch of Constantinople to the pope of Rome, 438.

Pius IV. Pope, copy of the creed of, 443, 444.

Pius VII. Pope, his excommunication of Napoleon, 445—450; remarks on, 451, 452.

Pope, authority and power of the, 46; his submission to Bonaparte, 47; infallibility of the, 50; his assumed power, 51; impious titles given him, 52; excommunication by the, 53; absurdity of calling the pope the head of the church, 53—55; profligate lives of many popes, 55, 56; arguments for the infallibility of the pope, 57, 58; alleged genealogy of the, 76, 77; interference of the, with the civil affairs of Ireland, 348; appeal of the Catholic Board of Ireland to the, 352; letter to The Protestant on the subject of Peter and the Pope's supremacy, 416—420; (see PETER for further references to the same subject:) absurdity of the pope pretending to derive his dignity from Peter, 432; authority of the popes in and after the reign of Constantine, 435—440; the pope becomes a temporal prince, 439, 440; Bishop Hay on the headship of the, 441; question of the pope's infallibility, ib. 442 and 444; creed of Pope Pius IV. the standard of Roman orthodoxy, 443, 444; the pope's excommunication of Napoleon, 445—450; mode of electing a pope, 453, 454; character of a number of popes, 455, 456; remarks on the crowning of Napoleon by the, 637; letter on the supremacy and infallibility of the pope, 790, 791; depravity and profligacy of many of the popes, 804—807; letter of Dr Milner on the supremacy of the, 825, 826.

Popery not Christianity, 70; evils of countenancing, 71; Popery the religion of corrupt human nature, 72; modern popish persecution, 73—75; instances of intolerance and persecution, 78—90; conformity of Popery with Paganism, 297—304; origin of, in the self-righteous bias of the human heart, 574; the term POPERY as applied to the church of Rome admitted by the Catholic Vindicator, 627; Dr Geddes's distinction between Popery and Catholic, 628; Christianity said by the Vindicator to owe its rise to the influence of Popery, 632; the question whether Popery is more favourable to good morals than Protestantism, discussed, 633, 634; the doctrines of Protestantism older than, 651—653; the system of, supported by falsehood and imposition, 677—679; state of, in America, 715—719; question as to the toleration of Popery, 743, 744; Popery not the original Christianity of Britain, 744, or Ireland, 745; nature and authority of Popish belief, 759; unity of Papists in the matter of faith shown to be false, 763—765; means by which it will be destroyed and the probable period, 844.

Porteous, Dr, on infallibility, 138.

Preston, in Lancashire, letter relating to a society of Protestants there, 576; letter from, correcting a mistake, 588; slanders propagated there regarding The Protestant, 636.

Priestley, Dr, his views as to the authority of the Bible similar to those of Dr Milner, 818.

Priests, Popish, rapacity of the, 36, 37; authority and character of, 42; profligacy of the, 90; pernicious effects of confession on the minds of, 389; wickedness of, in the matter of confession, ib., 390—392, 394; affect to be mediators between God and the people, 289—291.

Processions, similarity of popish and pagan processions, 303.

Prophecies, ancient, in the Old Testament regarding Antichrist, 834—839; other prophecies in the New Testament, 842—844.

Protestant, The, origin of, in animadversions on a paragraph which appeared in the Glasgow Chronicle regarding an Oratorio held in the Catholic Chapel, 11, 12 and 35; The "Protestant" denounced in the Popish chapel, Glasgow, 88; the publication at first discouraged by a number of Protestants, 91; its success, ib., 92, 93; profits of, devoted to educational purposes, 177; notice of the Rev. Andrew Scott's action at law against, 642; scandalous language applied to, by the Catholic Vindicator, 643, 644; The Protestant accused of forging passages from Tillotson, 684, 685, and of misquoting St Justin, 685, 686; review of the Report of the Jury Trial of Mr Scott's action against, 719—738; no evidence adduced to show that Mr Scott sustained injury from, 720; injury done to the cause of Popery by, 726; combination of Glasgow Papists to defame the author of, 730; The Protestant takes an active hand in establishing Catholic Schools in Glasgow, 733, 734; his acknowledgments to correspondents, 845, and to the subscribers for defraying the expense of his trial, 846; his farewell, ib.

Protestants, many so called ignorant of Christianity, 71; union among, in leading doctrines, greater than the unity of the church of Rome, 792—795.

Proverbs, book of, illustration of passages in the, as applicable to Antichrist or Popery, 835, 836.

Purgatory, subject introduced, 323; anecdote of the bridge in, ib.; Douay Catechism on, 324; doctrine of the church on, 325; Mr Gother on, ib.; decree of the Council of Trent regarding, 326; not a place where sins are remitted, but where they are punished, 328; a doctrine derived from the ancient heathens, ib.; contrasted with the doctrine of the salvation of Christ, 330 and 339, et seq.; society in Dublin for raising money to relieve from, 331—334; Purgatory divided into eight apartments, 334, 335; anecdote of the king of Spain in, 335; souls delivered from, represented by crabs, 336; sermon on, 337; no evidence of, in the Bible, 339—342; proof from Apocryphal books considered, 342; CANTING the corpse in Ireland, to obtain money to relieve it from, 344.

R

Real Presence, doctrine of the, 680, 681. See TRANSUBSTANTIATION.

Relics, Popish, use made of them and worship paid them, 236—240; catalogue of, 237; miracles ascribed to, 240—244; relics that formerly belonged to the cathedral of Glasgow, 241.

Religion, Dr Milner's method of finding out the true religion exposed and commented on, 749—752; the true religion not a hidden but a published thing, ib.; Dr Milner's second rule for finding out the true religion, 753—757; what true religion is, and why some reject it, ib. and 762.

Rhemish translators, misrepresentations of St Paul by the, 288.

Robber, story of a, and his fasts for the Virgin, 45.

Robertson, Dr, his account of the order of the Jesuits quoted, 581, 582.

Rome, question of St Peter ever having been at, 61; early bishops of, 62; no evidence of Peter ever having been at, 425—427; Peter was not bishop of, 427; conceit of the papists about the state of the church in, in primitive times, 433; no evidence of the bishop of, exercising jurisdiction over other churches, ib., 434; account of the early Christians in, 546; letter to The Protestant regarding a statement of 6000 skulls of children being found in a pond at Rome, 738; remarks on the same, 739, 740; profligacy of morals at, ib.; "Rome in the 19th century," extracts from a work so entitled, 611.

Rome, Church of, corruptness of the, 55, 56; taxes and absolutions of the, 63, 64; extolled by papists, 89, 90; real character of the, ib.; the subject of its keeping faith with heretics, 125—139; its claim to antiquity and universality answered, 234—236; differences of opinion in the, notwithstanding its pretended unity, 467; a man cannot faithfully serve God in the, 470; evidenced in the case of Mr Craig, a colleague of John Knox, 471; comparative purity of the, in the early ages, 544—546; not the invisible church referred to in the New Testament, 625 and 630, 631; the old story of its being founded on a rock exposed, 629; law of the, with regard to heretics, 702—704; claims the exclusive right of explaining the scriptures, 784; "the Church proves the Bible, and the Bible proves the Church," 787; Dr Milner's marks of the true Church, 789; claims of the church to unity denied, 789; union among Protestants greater than in the, 792—795; sanctity proved not to belong to the, 795, 796; Dr Milner's exposition of the doctrine of the, 799, 800; gross corruption of manners in the, especially among the clergy, 801—803; miracles claimed by the, 807—811; catholicity proved not to belong to the, 811, 812; apostolicity of the, discussed, 813—815; doctrine of the church of Rome identified with Socinianism, 815—819; possibility of salvation in the, admitted, 827; ancient prophecies in the Old and New Testaments regarding Antichrist applied to the, 834—839 and 842—844.

Romulus, worship paid to, transferred by the church of Rome to Theodorus, 302.

S

Sabbath, change of the, from the seventh to the first day considered as being founded on tradition, 778—780; circumstances relating to the observance of the, 779—781; proclamation of James I. and Charles I. for encouraging public games and sports on Sunday after church service, 781.

Sacrifice of Christ, scripture doctrine of the, 278—281 and 397—400.

Saint David's, bishop of, Dr Milner's address to the, 742, 743.

Saint-Worship, idolatry of, 197 and 209; the Catholic Vindicator's defence of, 654; the subject discussed, 655—658; origin of, 662—664.

Saints, division of labour among the Popish, 208; expense of creating, 213; known by the smell of their bones, 214; wearing out the, by persecution, 839, 840.

Salvation, the only way of, revealed to men, 386—388.

Sanctity, proved not to belong to the Church of Rome, 795, 796.

Satisfaction for sin, investigation of the doctrine of, 397—400.

Saviour, who is the saviour of sinners, question of, 233.

Savoy, duke of, his treaty with the Waldenses, 517.

Schools, Bishop Copinger on the use of the Bible in, 404; resolutions by certain Popish clergy against the reading of the Bible in, 405; Daniel O'Connell's speech against the use of the Bible in, 406, 407; the subject discussed, 407—415; letters on the same, 415, 416; correspondence between the secretaries of the Dublin School Union and bishop Troy, 474.

Scotland, Popery not established in, till towards the end of the eleventh century, 83; persecutions in, 85, 86.

Scotland, church of, subject of discipline in, discussed, 102—105; considered the purest in constitution and doctrine of all the established churches, 103; answer to Dr Milner's charge of Socinianism against the, 798, 799.

Scott, Rev. Andrew, Popish priest, afterwards bishop in Glasgow, denies that the Romish Church withholds the circulation of the Scriptures from the laity, 143, 144; alleged case of refusing to baptize a child, unless half a guinea were paid, 311, 312; his charges in other cases, 313, 314; notice of his action at law with The Protestant, 642; his connection with the Catholic Vindicator, 643; review of the report of the jury trial of Mr Scott's action against The Protestant, 719—738; no evidence adduced to show that Mr Scott sustained injury from The Protestant, 720; Mr Scott's miraculous method of keeping accounts without dates, 727—730; his statement of the number of his members inconsistent with the statement of his counsel, 731; his activity in establishing Catholic schools in Glasgow, 734.

Scriptures, injunction of "search the Scriptures," explained, 785. See BIBLE.

Secreta Monita, or secret rules of the Jesuits, 588—591; remarks on, 592.

Servetus, notice of the persecution of, 543.

Sherlock, Dr, extract from, 806, 807.

Silvester, Pope, in the reign of Constantine, 435.

Simanca, James, bishop of Bajadox, notice of, 137.

Simeon, Mr St Ange, French teacher in Glasgow, interview with The Protestant regarding the story of the Man-in-the-Wynd, 225—232; the "Pax" of the controversy, 232; referred to, 255, n.

Sin, doctrine of satisfaction for, investigated, 397—408.

Sins, subject of venial and mortal, 368—370.

Sixtus V., Pope, his editions of the Bible, 149; character of, 453 and 456; account of his election, 454.

Socinianism, repeal of the statute against those holding Socinian doctrines adverted to, 798; charge of Socinianism against the Church of Scotland answered, 798, 799; doctrines of the Church of Rome identified with, 815—819.

Solicitants, bull of the Pope against, 393.

Soup, recipe for making Italian, with a small piece of the Pope's shirt, 615.

Spain, hostility to the Bible in, 173; proposal in the Orthodox Journal that the British and Irish Papists emigrate to, 323; anecdote of the king of, 335; the queen of, lying in state, 337.

Spearing, Joseph, his work on Catholic Emancipation recommended, 690 and 695.

Stations, Irish, intemperance at, 560, 561.

Stillingfleet, Dr, his work "Preservative from Popery" quoted, 271.

Stoneyhurst, influence of the Jesuits' college at, 578.

Supremacy, letter on the subject of Peter and the Pope's, 416—420; the subject further discussed, See PETER and POPE.

Sym, William, clerk of the Glasgow Town's Hospital, letter from, 313, 314.

T

Tampering, question of "tampering" with the religious belief of others, 355—358.

Theodorus. See ROMULUS.

Thorpe, Rev. William, extracts from his pamphlet on the Catholic board, 352—355.

Tillotson, Bishop, The Protestant accused of forging passages from his discourse on Transubstantiation, 684—688.

Tobit, book of, notice of the, 657.

Toleration, distinction between the non-toleration of Popery and persecution, 743, 744.

Tracts, circulation of cheap tracts among Papists recommended, 177.

Tradition, claims of Papists to, as a rule of faith, 769; meaning of the word "tradition," 771, 772; vanity and uncertainty of Popish tradition, 772—776; apostles' creed considered as oral tradition, 775, 776; sense in which Protestants use tradition, 776; illustrated by the cases of Milton and Ossian, 777, 778; practices alleged to have been derived from tradition, 778—782.

Transubstantiation, subject of, 48, 49; doctrine of, discussed, 248—274; defined by the Council of Trent, 249; and by a modern French catechism, 250, 251; absurdity of the doctrine, ib. and 253, 254; its pernicious effects, 254, 255; the testimony of a believer in, not to be relied on in any thing else, 255; pretended antiquity of, discussed and disproved, 256—259; opinions of the ancient fathers regarding, ib.; method of putting the faith of a priest on this subject to the test, 259, 260; use of the senses in judging of, 261; the believer in, in danger of committing fatal mistakes, 263; persecution for enforcing the belief of, 264; speech of Earl Grey on the subject of, 265, 266; subject of, again discussed, 679—681 and 682—685; doctrines of the ancient fathers regarding, 686—688.

Trent, Council of, recognizes the breaking of faith with heretics, 127; rule of regarding the reading the Bible, 145, 147, 218; decree of the, regarding the mass, 276; decree of, concerning Purgatory, 326; animadverted on, 331; doctrine of the, regarding penance and confession, 367.

Troy, Bishop, correspondence between, and the Secretaries of the Dublin School Union, 474.

Truth, letter from a lover of, in Greenock, 462.

Tuam, archbishop of, his charge to his clergy regarding educational schools in Ireland, 346; extracts from, with comments, 350—362.

U

Unction, Extreme. See EXTREME UNCTION.

Unity, not a feature of the Church of Rome, 789; union among Protestants in leading doctrines greater than among Papists, 792—795.

Vestments, sacred, used in celebrating mass, 293, 294.

Viar, St, a pretended saint of Spain, 209.

Vindicator, Catholic. See CATHOLIC VINDICATOR.

Virgin Mary, her prerogatives, 45; virtue of fasting on Saturdays in honour of, ib.; glory of the, by the Rhemish translators, 181, 182; worshipped, ib.; devotion to the, 185, 186; prayer to the, 187; hymn to the, ib.; another prayer to the, ib.; Litany of the Blessed Virgin, 188; idolatrous addresses to the Virgin, 189, 190; her title of "Mother of God" objected to, 189; exalted above Christ, 191; her miracles, ib. and 192; how they encourage licentiousness, 192; Christ rebukes those who would pay her undue respect, 194; vision of Mary to Thomas à Becket, 195; Orison to, ib.; immense number of prayers addressed to the Virgin, 196; miraculous power of images of the, 222; subject of the adoration of the, discussed, 654—662; origin of the worship of, 662, 663; titles bestowed on her, 664; virtues attributed to her, 665; story of her death and funeral, with her assumption to heaven, 665; story of her, and a wicked friar, 667; the morality of her worshippers in Glasgow, 672; differences in the Romish Church regarding the immaculate conception of the, 763—765.

W

Wafer, use of the word objected to, 14; answered, 17; consecrated, see HOST.

Waldenses, bull for extirpating the, 41; persecutions of the, 80—84; Waldenses in England and Scotland, 83, 84; dreadful persecutions of the, 517—523; Jones's History of the, quoted, 520—523; cruel persecutions of the, adverted to, 840; Milton's sonnet on the, quoted, ib.

Waldo, Peter, the supposed founder of the Waldenses, 80.

Wales, Beuno and Wenefride, saints of, 200; few Catholics in, 458; antiquity of its usages, 459.

Warren, Richard B. his reply to O'Connell on the use of the Bible in schools, 408; extract from, 409.

Washing of feet, question as to the abrogation of this duty as enjoined by Christ, 783.

Water, Holy, use of, in the Church of Rome and in ancient Pagan temples, 299; benediction of horses with, at Rome, 299, 300.

Watson, Bishop, erroneously quoted by Dr Milner, 758; his character touched on, ib.

W. D. letter from, on Popish idolatry, &c., 304—306; answered, 306—310; second letter from, 462—464; remarks on, 464—470.

Wells, Holy, superstitions practised at, in Ireland, 245—248; ceremonies practised at, in Ireland, 320, 321.

Wenefride, St, Life and Miracles of, 199 and 201—205 and 206, 207; prayer to, 216; her character adverted to, 459, 460; supposed to be a favourite saint of the Catholic Vindicator, 670.

Westmoreland, earl of, instigated by the Pope to rebel, 110.

Whitaker, quoted by Amicus Veritatis, 617; his character as a writer, 618.

White, Blanco, quoted, 68.

Wickliffe, John, his early translation of the Bible, 148; bull against, 149.

Worship, note from a correspondent regarding the proper objects of, 414.

Wynd, Man-in-the, story of him abandoning his wife because she would remain a Protestant, 127; the subject adverted to, 193; declaration of three witnesses proving the truth of the story, with remarks on, 225—232; final reference to the story of, 673—675.

X

Xavier, St, Francis, miracles attributed to, 807, 808.

Xenophon, his work referred to, 545.

Z

Zaragossa, account of the abduction of a young lady of, to the Inquisition, 533.

GLASGOW:
W. G. BLACKIE AND CO., PRINTERS,
VILLAFIELD.

REPORT OF A TRIAL

IN

THE JURY COURT, EDINBURGH,

ON THE 25TH JUNE, 1821,

FOR AN ALLEGED LIBEL:

IN THE CASE

REV. ANDREW SCOTT, ROMAN CATHOLIC PRIEST, GLASGOW,

VERSUS

WILLIAM M'GAVIN, AUTHOR OF A WORK ENTITLED

THE PROTESTANT, AND OTHERS.

TAKEN IN SHORTHAND.

TO THE READER.

THE publication of the following Report has been delayed much longer than was expected, solely from the circumstance of the shorthand writer's failing to extend his notes within reasonable time. The whole of his manuscript was not received till the 3d of the present month; and it comes down no farther than the conclusion of Mr. Moncreiff's speech for the defender, Mr. M'Gavin. What follows has been supplied from other sources, as the reader will see, in the connecting paragraph, page 62.

The manuscript had not the advantage of being revised by the speakers on either side, or by any of the judges. It cannot, therefore, be expected that the speeches of the learned gentlemen should possess that elegance and precision which might have been imparted to them by such revisal. It is presumed, however, that they will be found substantially correct in point of sentiment; and, in style, nearly, if not exactly, as they were delivered. This applies to the speeches of Messrs. Cockburn and Moncreiff only; for of that of Mr. Jeffrey, no distinct report could be obtained.

Persons who write shorthand are aware, that the correctness of a report will sometimes depend on its being immediately extended, while the memory can supply the meaning of an illegible, or doubtful character or mark. The Reporter, in the present instance, by his long delay, deprived himself of this advantage; and, therefore, in his manuscript, there is, occasionally, an ellipsis that required to be filled up from the sense and scope of the passage. These, however, are few, and of no great importance.

It is probable that the names of some of the pursuer's witnesses may not be quite correct in point of orthography, being taken down merely from the sound that reached the Reporter's ear.

Glasgow, Nov. 19th, 1821.

REPORT OF TRIAL

FOR LIBEL.

SCOTT versus M'GAVIN.

REPORT of the TRIAL before the Jury Court, 25th June, 1821, of the ISSUES in the Cause in which the Rev. ANDREW SCOTT, Roman Catholic Clergyman in Glasgow, was Pursuer; and WILLIAM M'GAVIN, Merchant in Glasgow, WILLIAM SYM, Clerk of the Glasgow Town Hospital, and ANDREW and JAMES DUNCAN, Printers in Glasgow, were Defenders.

Present,

The Right Hon. WILLIAM ADAM, Lord Chief Commissioner.

Lord PITMILLY, and Lord GILLIES, } Lords Commissioners.

Counsel for the Pursuer,

FRANCIS JEFFREY, Esq.
HENRY COCKBURN, Esq. and
A. CURRIE, Esq.
Messrs. L. & C. GORDON, Agents.

Counsel for the Defenders,

JAMES MONCREIFF, Esq.
J. A. MURRAY, Esq. and
J. S. MORE, Esq.
Messrs. W. & A. G. ELLIS, Agents.

The following persons were sworn as Jurymen:—viz.

James Fraser, Baker, Stockbridge.
Henry Banks, Tailor, Duke Street.
Allan Bell, Farmer, Craigbrae.
James Matthie, Farmer, Milltown.
John Robertson, Spirit Dealer, Frederick Street.
Francis Slate, Farmer, Sunnyside.
Andrew Dawson, Currier, Dalkeith.
John Rutherford, Baker, there.
Robert Kinnear, Bookseller, Frederick Street.
Robert Hogg, Baker, there.
Frederick M'Laggan, Baker, there.
Peter Begbie, Farmer, Cairndennis.

LORD CHIEF COMMISSIONER.—"That the points which the Jury are to decide upon, should be before them during the whole proceedings, is a great advantage of this Court. In ordinary short cases, the Issues are read and copies are given the Jury afterwards: but, in such a long case as the present, I think it would be better, that the Jury should have the copies before them now, that they may peruse them along with the Clerk, while he reads the Issues."

(Copies of the Issues were handed to the Jury.)

The Clerk then read the following Issues.

I. It being admitted that the following words, written and composed by the defender, William M'Gavin, were by his authority inserted and published in a certain newspaper called the Glasgow Chronicle, on or about the 2d day of July, 1818, viz., "But this is not all; I ask A. V. if that house (meaning the new Catholic chapel) was not built in a great measure at the expense of a poor, and in some instances, a starving people? I ask him, if money was not extorted by the fear of future punishment, for the purpose of building that house, from persons who had scarcely bread for their families, or clothes to cover them? and is this what he calls the piety and public spirit of the Catholics of Glasgow? The Almighty hates robbery for burnt-offering;—and will he accept, as honourable to him, that which has been wrung from the sweat, and sinews, and blood, of his own miserable creatures? Let the means by which this house was reared be inscribed upon its front, and it will remain for 'ages to come' a monument of Popish hard-heartedness and cruelty." Which words, written and composed as aforesaid, are admitted to have been again printed and published by the authority aforesaid, by the defenders, Andrew and James Duncan, in the eighth number of a weekly paper called The Protestant, on or about the fifth day of September, 1818,—using the word "honouring" in The Protestant, which is printed "honourable" in the newspaper. And also the following words: "I did not point at him as the person who was exclusively employed in the work of extorting money from the poor; I did not know how many agents were engaged weekly in that pious undertaking; I do not know whether Mr Scott be the only priest that officiated while the chapel was building, or whether he be the only one that officiates in it at present. The house that is building immediately west of the chapel, and which is, it is said, intended for the Manse, will be large enough to accommodate a dozen of priests while they remain unmarried, as they must always do; from which I infer that he either has, or intends to have, abundant assistance in milking and managing his flock.

"It is doubtful how far he exhibits the character of a faithful pastor, while he seems to care only for himself; he asked no answer or explanations for his flock, it was for himself, as an individual. One, at least, of his flock had been severely attacked and exposed, as guilty of a piece of shameful imposition, equal to a forgery in the name of Luther. Fearing, perhaps, that this would also be applied to him, he takes care to let me know that he had no hand in the controversy. This is very well, and I hope he will thank me for making it public; but he ought to have some mercy on the guilty one of his flock. If he asked no explanation for him, he ought to demand explanation from him; he ought to put him on a course of severe penance for the good of his soul, for certainly he was guilty of a far greater crime than that of eating flesh on Friday. If no such penance is enjoined, the priest ought to be held as consenting to his crime, or thinking very lightly of it.

"I shall resume this subject in my next number, and give some examples to confirm what I wrote about money being extorted from poor persons for the purpose of building the Popish chapel."

WHETHER the foresaid words, or any part of them, are of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and maliciously represent and hold out the said pursuer as having improperly extorted money from the poor of the Catholic persuasion, for the purpose of erecting the Catholic chapel in Clyde Street, Glasgow, to the damage and injury of the said pursuer?

II. It being admitted that the following words, written and composed by the defender, William M'Gavin, were, by his authority, inserted in the aforesaid paper called The Protestant, No. 9, admitted to have been printed and published by the defenders Andrew and James Duncan, on or about the 12th day of September, 1818, viz., "If it be not true that 'money was extorted for building the Popish chapel by the fear of future punishment, from persons who had scarcely bread for their families, or clothes to cover them,' why is it that neither Mr Scott nor any of his people have publicly denied the charges insinuated in the obnoxious paragraph which he has quoted from my letter?" And also the following words: "Even the Papists in Glasgow are not insensible of the evidence of their own empty stomachs, and the clamours of their hungry children, when they were obliged to give weekly so many of their hard-earned pence, for the building of the chapel; and, if the facts were denied, hundreds of witnesses would rise up among themselves to confirm them.

"The chapel must have cost as much money as would have built three comfortable houses sufficiently large. It is well known that the bulk of the adherents of the Romish church here, are poor labouring people; and it is not denied that the necessary funds, with the exception of a small sum from some very liberal Protestants, were raised among the people themselves. There was a sort of poll-tax imposed upon the members, according to their real or supposed circumstances." As also the following words: "In my last number I promised to give some examples, to confirm what I wrote about money being extorted from poor persons for the purpose of building the Popish chapel." As also the following words: "But, as I shall show presently, there was a heavy tax imposed upon the people without their consent; and all who submitted to this became, in fact, the vassals or slaves of their tax-masters. They stood no longer on the high and independent ground which every British subject is entitled to occupy: their property, the hard-earned fruit of their labour, was at the arbitrary disposal of persons over whom they had no control, and who would not deign to consult them with regard to its application."

"Besides, nothing less, it seems, would suffice to gratify the vanity of him, or them, who had the charge of the money so extorted from the people, than a splendid edifice, equal at least to some ancient cathedral; or, to use the words of AMICUS VERITATIS, a house resembling 'as much as possible the majesty of that God to whose service it was to be dedicated.'" As also the following words: "Now it is a fact, that while the chapel was a-building, the people, while they yet met in their old place of worship, were assured by their ghostly father,* that such of them as fell behind in their payments, should not enjoy church privileges. What was this, but extorting money by the fear of future punishment? and, from the condition of many of those from whom it was so extorted, who can doubt that they had often scarcely food for their families, or clothes to cover them? Every one knows in what estimation Papists regard the privileges of their church. To be denied these, is the same as to be denied the salvation of their souls: The poor therefore were told, in language sufficiently plain, that if the chapel tax was not punctually paid, they should suffer the pains of purgatory, or even hell itself.

* "This phrase is not used as a term of reproach.—Ghostly is the old English word for spiritual; and, according to the Douay Catechism, ghostly father is the title by which the clergy choose to be called."

"That this tax was extorted, and not always paid voluntarily, even from the fear of purgatory, is evident from the following fact:—There was a number of Papists employed, while the chapel was a-building, in one of the public works in the suburbs. These, it seems, were very unwilling to pay the tax. Application was therefore made to the manager, that he would retain, in his own hands, a portion of their weekly earnings, to assist in building the chapel; for, as the applicant informed him, he could not trust the people themselves with the payment of their dues. The proprietors of the work, much to their honour, refused to comply with the request, rightly judging that the labourer was entitled to the whole reward of his labour, without any deduction whatever. This is but one instance of the kind; but it is enough to show the manner in which money was extorted, without the consent of the people themselves, when by any means the collectors for the chapel could lay their hands on their property."

"I shall proceed to give a few more facts on this subject. The reader may rely on their authenticity.—I could, indeed, give the names of the parties concerned, but I do not choose to do so, unless I shall be judicially called upon. I have been informed that some of my Papist neighbours talk big about my having libelled them; they even speak of a legal prosecution against me, for what I have written on the subject of their extorting money from the poor; and they will compel me, they say, to answer Mr Scott's question, whether or not I refer to him as the person who did so? I have no doubt the Papists of the present day are very willing to employ the old Popish argument of fines and imprisonments, and worse, if they could, against all whom they cannot otherwise confute; and if they had the Inquisition at command, they would no doubt silence me. It seems there is no resource left them, but to appeal to some criminal tribunal; for they find that arguments and facts are all against them. It is my happiness, however, to live in a country in which there is no Inquisition; and, therefore, I shall, without fear, produce my facts, as I have hitherto done my arguments, leaving the reader to judge how far my assertions are proved by them:—

"A man who now lives out of the city, was assessed in a certain weekly sum for building the chapel. During the dull trade, he fell back with regard to his payments. His family, however, continued to increase, and when he went to his ghostly father to get a child baptized, he was asked, How he stood with regard to his payments? He confessed, what he could not deny, that during the hard times he had fallen behind. He was ordered to go about his business, and told, that his child should not be baptized, till he had paid every farthing that he was due. Before he was able to raise the necessary sum, the child died; and the father was left to suffer all the misery which such a circumstance would occasion to one who considered baptism necessary to the salvation of his child." And also the following words: "I can, if necessary, give the name of a poor man, who subsisted partly on charity, and partly by carrying coals, and whose very clothing, such as it was, was furnished by some benevolent individuals, from whom not less than six shillings was exacted at one time to assist in building the Popish chapel. I can give the name of another, residing in Calton, who is in bad health, and who has sent several times for his ghostly father to visit him in his distress; but the said father will not go to him, because he has fallen behind in his payments. There is no comfort, it seems, for the poor. This individual may die without confession, without absolution, and he may perish for ever; because he cannot pay a certain sum to defray the expense of the chapel."

"There are two young men, apprentices, each of whose earnings did not exceed four shillings a-week. Out of this miserable pittance, one was obliged to pay sixpence, the other ninepence, a fortnight: I believe, in the estimation of those who had lately the distribution of public bounty, in a time of great distress, four shillings a-week was understood to be the lowest sum by which a grown person could support life; what then must have been the condition of two hard-working young men, who could earn no more, and who were obliged to give so large a portion of it to defray the expense of the ridiculous gewgaws of the chapel in Clyde Street?" And the following words: "I could give the instance of a poor woman, who, though she had paid as long as she was able, yet, falling behind, she durst not gratify herself with a sight of the new chapel after it was finished. She frankly told her neighbours that she did not dare to go till she was able to pay up what she was due. She was of course deprived of all the ordinances of the sanctuary, as it is called; she was left destitute of all the consolations of her religion; she was left to live without comfort, and to die without hope, because she could not pay the chapel tax!

"The following case presents a ghostly father in a more favourable light, and exhibits one of that holy order not quite destitute of human feelings. Sometime ago this father was called to visit one of his people who was dangerously ill. One of his first questions, as usual, was, How he stood with regard to his payments? He was answered, That owing to the state of his family he had fallen behind. The visitor seemed not a little surprised that the sick person should have the assurance to send for him, while his dues were not paid up, and reproved him very warmly for it. He then asked, If there was any money in the house? and being informed that there was only one shilling, he demanded and got it. His attention was then turned a little to the case of the sick person; but he soon resumed the subject of money, and gave back the shilling, on condition that the whole that was due should be paid as soon as possible." And also the following words: "I have more facts at the service of Mr Scott, if he shall think these insufficient to confirm my assertion. But I shall conclude this number, by asking him some questions, to which I hope he will write an answer; and if he does so, I will readily give it a place in The Protestant. Indeed, it is my earnest desire that he would defend himself and his cause; for that is in danger of becoming a tame controversy that is all on one side. I ask Mr Scott, whether he did not, on a certain day, denounce some of his people by name, before his whole congregation, for falling behind in the weekly impost?—if he did not pronounce very awful curses against the unhappy individuals, and threaten to consign their souls to everlasting punishment, if the money was not paid? I ask, if he did not refer to others, besides those whom he named, as also in arrears, and threaten them with similar judgment, if they did not speedily pay?"

WHETHER the foresaid words, or any part of them, are of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and maliciously represent and hold out the said pursuer as having improperly extorted money from the poor of the Catholic persuasion for the purpose of erecting the Catholic chapel in Clyde Street, Glasgow, to the damage and injury of the said pursuer?

III. It being admitted that the following words, written and composed by the defender, William M'Gavin, were, by his authority, inserted in the foresaid paper called The Protestant, No. 72, admitted to have been printed and published by the defenders A. & J. Duncan, on or about the 27th day of November, 1819, viz., "I return now to a subject of a more private and local nature. My readers have already been informed of the numerous extortions practised upon the poor Papists in Glasgow, in order to raise and uphold the magnificent establishment in Clyde Street. In addition to my former statements on this subject, take the following case, which is officially certified by the Clerk of the Town's Hospital, and is introduced in a letter from him, as follows:" It being also admitted that the following words were written and composed by the defender, William Sym, and were inserted by the defender, William M'Gavin, in the aforesaid paper called The Protestant, No. 72, by the authority of the said defender, William Sym, viz.

"Glasgow Town's Hospital,
"September, 1819.

"SIR,—At the desire of the gentlemen of this institution, I transmit to you the following facts, that you may make use of them, if you think proper, in your paper, The Protestant. The gentlemen of the committee were much surprised at the conduct of Mr Scott in the affair, and were desirous to be personally informed of the case. A part of their number accordingly called upon the woman, when, in the presence of four individuals, she went over the facts stated in the Superintendent's report, and declared that she was ready to depone upon oath as to their verity.

"She then farther stated, that Mr Scott would not recommend her children for admission into the Catholic Schools, till she threatened, that if he would not, she would apply to get them admitted into one of the Protestant Charity Schools. And, in corroboration of the fact, regarding the charge made by Mr Scott, she mentioned that it was a gentleman, named Mr Kerr, whom she employed to wait on the priest, in order to obtain baptism for her child. The gentlemen of the committee also waited upon this person, who resides in High Street. I forget the number, but I was in his house. He being a Catholic also, soon suspected the drift of the inquiry; and, with their characteristic cunning on such occasions, did all in his power to elude giving the information wanted.

"He, however, distinctly admitted, that though he used a good deal of entreaty with Mr Scott in behalf of the poor woman, yet, that he found it necessary to pay to Mr Scott the eight shillings mentioned in the woman's story, before he would consent to baptize the child. This man's wife, who was not a Catholic, was strongly inclined to give some additional information respecting the case, but was silenced by her husband.

"The committee have frequently had occasion to believe that some of their pensioners were in the habit of contributing towards the erection of the chapel; but they thought this case too particular a one to be passed over in the customary silence. Here follows the Superintendent's report read to the committee, which he made up in his annual visitation of the Hospital poor:—

"20*th August*, 1819.—Betty Dochie, alias Widow Hanlin, 44, Bridgegate, aged 36, has three children: Helen 5 years and 3 months; Michael 3 years; and Alice 8 months. Has thirty shillings quarterly from the hospital; no other supply. She strips feathers; has three other children variously employed. Her husband died in January last; had, before his death, given to Mr Scott four pounds; but had fallen back in his payments, in consequence of which, Mr Scott refused to recommend the children for admission to the Popish Schools. Nor would he baptize the infant, which was only two months old at its father's death, till the mother pawned a pair of blankets, for five shillings, and borrowed three shillings from a friend, and paid Mr Scott eight shillings; partly for christening the child, and partly for her husband's arrears. She says she will declare the above to be truth before God and man. I am, &c. WILLIAM SYM, Clerk."

"And it being further admitted, that the following words were written and composed by the defender, William M'Gavin, and were by his authority inserted in the aforesaid paper, called The Protestant, No. 72, viz. 'Thus it seems we are assessed, not for the support of our own poor brethren only, but also for the support of widows and orphans of Papists, who have been impoverished by the extortion of their priest; and thus the good citizens of Glasgow, who lately made so bold a stand against being taxed for the purpose of building parish churches, are actually, though indirectly, taxed for the building and support of a Popish chapel!

"Thus far I had proceeded in composing the present Number, when I received some farther information, from the same authentic source, with regard to Mr Scott and widow Hanlin, which justice to both parties requires me to communicate. On Martinmas day, when the widow called at the Hospital for her half-quarter's allowance, she stated that, about a month before that, Mr Scott had called upon her, and that without upbraiding her for divulging the story which I have given above, he returned to her the eight shillings which he had extorted from her for the baptism of her child, &c.; and farther, that he had given her 12 lbs. of meal per week, for three weeks; and that, moreover, he had charged her to tell this to no man.

"I hope Mr Scott will believe me, when I say that this is the best thing I ever heard of him; and as I am assured that he had been informed that the widow's case had been communicated to me, he will allow me to congratulate myself, as the happy instrument, of not only relieving the widow, but also of producing a benevolent feeling in his mind, to which, perhaps, he had been too long a stranger. If Mr Scott be possessed of human feelings, he must have had more pleasure in returning these eight shillings to the poor widow, and in giving her a little meal, than in the many thousand pounds which have been extorted from persons almost as poor as she. Nay, I will venture to assert, that he never felt so much pleasure in contemplating the lofty minarets of his chapel, or the spacious rooms of his manse, with the extortions by means of which they were reared, as he felt when he put the silver into the widow's hands.

"This, however, is not the first instance of restitution that is on record. The reader will recollect a case in my ninth Number, in which a whole shilling was restored, after having been extorted from a poor sick person; and if more instances had been communicated to me, I should gladly have recorded them. It is pleasant to see that the work of restitution has begun, and proceeded so far; because this is one evidence that the extortioner has begun to repent; and though the extortion itself has produced nearly twenty thousand pounds, and though the amount of the restitution is, upon the whole, only nine shillings in money, and four pecks and a half of oat-meal, we must not be discouraged, but hope for the best, knowing that the greatest things in the world, even Rome itself, arose out of small beginnings."

WHETHER the foresaid words, or any part of them, are of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and maliciously represent and hold out the said pursuer as having improperly extorted money from the poor of the Catholic persuasion, for the purpose of erecting the Catholic chapel in Clyde Street, Glasgow, to the damage and injury of the said pursuer?

OR,

IV. WHETHER, on or about the month of October, 1814, the pursuer did refuse to baptize the child of Henry Courtney, labourer, lately in Anderston, and now in Cowcaddens, Glasgow, a person of the Roman Catholic persuasion, and one of the contributors to the Roman Catholic chapel aforesaid, because he, Courtney, was in arrear of his contribution, until the said Courtney should pay the said arrears to the collectors for the chapel? And whether at or about Easter, 1815, the pursuer did refuse confession to the said Courtney, because he had not paid his contribution to the said chapel?

V. WHETHER, about six years ago, the pursuer did refuse to baptize the child of Philip M'Geechie, now in Manchester, late residenter in Glasgow, a person of the Roman Catholic persuasion, and a member of the pursuer's congregation, because the said M'Geechie was in arrear in his contribution to the said chapel?

VI. WHETHER, in the year 1814, the pursuer did apply to Mr Haughton Fleming, or to Mr Bowman Fleming, who carried on a dye-work in Hutcheson Town, Glasgow, to retain in their hands a portion of the weekly earnings of such Catholics as were employed in their works, to be applied towards building said Roman Catholic chapel?

VII. WHETHER, on or about the month of June, 1818, the pursuer did refuse to baptize the child of John Drain, weaver in Duke Street, Glasgow, one of the contributors to the Catholic chapel aforesaid, because the said Drain was then in arrears of his contribution to said chapel?

(Signed) WILLIAM ADAM,
Lord Chief Com.

Damages laid at £3000.

Jury Court, May 16, 1821.

MR COCKBURN—"There is a witness in our list, who is designed Catharine Ure, instead of Christian Mure. I propose to alter this misnomer. If she had a number of other designations, I am not sure these would be an objection to her. As I am entitled to add another new witness, I suppose the other party do not object to what I have proposed."

MR MONCREIFF—"No, my Lord, we do not object."

MR COCKBURN—"My Lord Chief Commissioner, and Gentlemen of the Jury, this is an action of damages which is brought by the pursuer, Mr Scott, the Roman Catholic clergyman of Glasgow, against the defender, Mr M'Gavin, for what he conceives to be a continued and systematic course of calumny adopted against him by that defender.

"From the Issues that have been read, and put into your hands, you might at first sight, perhaps, be led to imagine there was some discussion here between the Catholics and Protestants; and, I have no doubt, the defender will endeavour, as far as he can, to make the question assume that appearance. But, I state to you precisely, this is an action purely for calumnies; and, if you be of opinion these calumnies have been uttered, and are injurious, I am sure you will not allow your justice to be misled by any prejudice against the pursuer, because he happens to be of the Catholic persuasion.

"The facts to be investigated are simple, although they branch out into ample extent.

"The Roman Catholic chapel at Glasgow, sometime ago, was found to be totally unfit for the worship of the Catholic inhabitants. It was therefore resolved to build a new chapel; and a new chapel has been built. I am sure, there can be no idea or opinion but one, as to the expediency and piety of that design. As long as we happen to have such a town as Glasgow, of which a great part of the population is Catholic,—admitting it to be our duty to reclaim as many as we can to what we consider the pure faith,—the next object is, to educate them according to their own religion. And so strong was the impression there, and over the kingdom, of the propriety of a chapel for the Catholics, that this was liberally subscribed to, not only by Catholics all over the island, but by many Protestants, and there in particular. It was patronised and liberally subscribed for by Kirkman Finlay, at that time, or soon afterwards, the chief magistrate of the city, and its representative in Parliament.

"Mr Scott, as was his duty and interest, took a warm and active part in the promotion of that object; and, the first fact I have to call your attention to, to-day, is, that during three years and a half that edifice took in erecting, after August, 1813, when it was begun, there was not a whisper breathed against his proceedings, on account of his connection with that chapel; and, it is a fact beyond all dispute, that this person, who has since found it convenient to run him down, as I shall show you soon, during the time the work was going on, never stated, either privately or publicly, any thing against Mr Scott. You will observe, that, while the acts of extortion, since laid to Mr Scott's charge by the defender, were going on,—while the parties were living, and on the spot, against whom the crime was committed,—while every thing was fresh in the memory of those against whom it was perpetrated,—Mr M'Gavin, living on the spot, and taking, as he says, a warm interest in the Protestant cause, never published or made a single charge against these Roman Catholics.

"After this virtual acquiescence by Mr M'Gavin in the propriety of Mr Scott's conduct, or at least never giving any reason to suppose he thought unfavourably of him, the chapel was finished; and the first use that it was put to (and this was not done by Catholics only, but by all in that place) was, that there was an Oratorio allowed to be held in it, in order to raise a sum of money for a charitable purpose,—I believe, for schools for the education of children of the poorer Catholics.

"As soon as this Oratorio took place, which was patronised chiefly by Catholics, there appeared in the Glasgow Chronicle a statement, which I should not think calculated to excite the disapprobation of any person upon earth. 'We feel pleasure in noticing the numerous and respectable auditory which was assembled at the Oratorio on Thursday last. The zeal and activity of the directors, the alacrity and pleasure with which their solicitations in behalf of a charitable and philanthropic institution were complied with, the great respect paid alike to the subject and the place, form a pleasing and characteristic feature of the age, and must afford an inexhaustible fund of pleasing reflection to the contemplative Christian. May we not hope that these reasons, and the general satisfaction afforded by the performance, will induce Bishop Cameron to grant his permission for another Oratorio at a future period? We cannot close this subject without offering our mead of praise to M. de Monti, for his extraordinary exertions, which the shortness of the notice required.'

"Let this statement be as diabolical as Mr M'Gavin may represent it to be, I now state to you that it was not written, dictated, suggested, or seen by the pursuer of this action. In point of fact, it now turns out that it was written by one of the principal directors of that Oratorio. Mr Scott had nothing to do with it; and, although he had published it, and put his name to it, (as to taste, I know not whether the music was good or bad,) surely it was not a publication calculated to excite any animosity whatever. But there began a war in the newspapers about this Oratorio; one writer signed himself "Pax," and another, a "Friend of Truth." A war began about this Oratorio, and the building in which it took place; but Mr Scott had no concern with this discussion, any more than you or I.

"After this, Mr M'Gavin came forward, and began with this publication, which is in the first Issue in your hands, at the bottom of the first page. 'But this is not all; I ask A. V. if that house (meaning the new Catholic chapel) was not built, in a great measure, at the expense of a poor, and, in some instances, a starving people? I ask him, if money was not extorted by the fear of future punishment, for the purpose of building that house, from persons who had scarcely bread for their families, or clothes to cover them? And is this what he calls the piety and public spirit of the Catholics of Glasgow? The Almighty hates robbery for burnt-offering;—and will he accept, as honourable to him, that which has been wrung from the sweat, and sinews, and blood of his own miserable creatures? Let the means by which this house was reared, be inscribed upon its front, and it will remain for 'ages to come' a monument of Popish hard-heartedness and cruelty.'

"At the time that those extravagant words were made use of, it was perfectly well known to Mr M'Gavin, as to every body about Glasgow, that Mr Scott, as was his duty, had taken a warm interest about this chapel; and when he saw this outrageous and most unprovoked attack, not upon him by name, but upon those who had promoted the erection of the chapel, you will not think the worse of him that he wrote a letter to the editor of the Chronicle, requiring to know whether he was alluded to in that publication. His letter was proper, as was every thing he had done as to the chapel. It was in these words:

TO THE EDITOR OF THE GLASGOW CHRONICLE.

Glasgow, 31*st July*, 1818.

"SIR,—From your paper of Thursday, the 22d of July current, I quote the following paragraph from a letter addressed to you as editor, under the signature of 'A Protestant:'

'But this is not all. I ask A. V. if that house (meaning the new Catholic chapel) was not built, in a great measure, at the expense of a poor, and, in some instances, a starving people? I ask him, if money was not extorted by the fear of future punishment, for the purpose of building that house, from persons who had scarcely bread for their families, or clothes to cover them? And is this what he calls the piety and public spirit of the Catholics of Glasgow? The Almighty hates robbery for burnt-offering;—and will he accept, as honourable to him, that which has been wrung from the sweat, and sinews, and blood of his own miserable creatures? Let the means by which this house was reared, be inscribed upon its front, and it will remain for 'ages to come' a monument of Popish hard-heartedness and cruelty.'

"It is well known to the public, and to the people of Glasgow in particular, that it was I who took the active management and superintendence of forwarding the new Catholic chapel, and obtaining subscriptions and money for it. From this circumstance, it has occurred to many, that the paragraph above quoted, pointed at and referred to me; but I have no means, in the first instance, of ascertaining the truth of this, or the intentions of the writer, except by an application to you. I have therefore to request that you favour me with the real name and address of the author of the letter, or that he, through you, explicitly state, whether he meant or referred to me, as the person who had extorted money, by the fear of future punishment, for the purpose of building the Catholic chapel, from persons who had scarcely bread for their families, or clothes to cover them.

"It was sometime after the letter referred to appeared in your paper, before I either saw or heard of it as applied to me, otherwise I would have made this communication sooner.—I am, Sir, your most obedient servant,

(Signed) ANDREW SCOTT.'

"The editor of the paper, a gentleman of the name of Prentice, sent a proper, respectful, and honourable answer to this letter. He writes, 'Rev. Sir,—In answer to your letter of this morning, I beg leave to state, that I was absent at Appleby when the letter to which you refer was inserted in the Glasgow Chronicle. As I therefore cannot take the responsibility upon myself, I am afraid that I cannot, with propriety, refuse to give you the name of the writer,—Mr M'Gavin, of the house of Messrs. M'Gavin & Lamb.—I am, Rev. Sir, your most obedient servant,

(Signed) 'DAVID PRENTICE.'

Chronicle Office, 31*st July*, 1818.'

"So here Mr M'Gavin was given up as the author of that paper; and then Mr Scott applied to him in the same respectful and civil manner. After quoting the correspondence which he had had with Mr Prentice, he says, 'As that gentleman condescends on you, as the writer of the letter alluded to, I now request to be favoured with your answer to my inquiry.—I am, Sir, your most obedient servant, (Signed) ANDREW SCOTT.

6, Dunlop Street, Glasgow, 31st July, 1818.'

"If Mr M'Gavin was conscious that these words were not meant to be applied to Mr Scott; or if he was conscious that he did not mean to say they applied truly, nothing was more obvious for him than to state this fact; but, if you find Mr M'Gavin equivocating, or giving evasive answers, (his subsequent calumnies do not admit of exaggeration); if you be of opinion his answer was evasive, your conclusion must be, that, from that moment, he must have felt that he was doing wrong. After receiving this letter from a clergyman, accused of extortion and robbery, M'Gavin wrote, 'Rev. Sir,—I have received your letter of yesterday's date, with a copy of your correspondence with the editor of the Glasgow Chronicle; in reply to which, I have only to say, that if you, or any of your flock, feel injured, or misrepresented by any thing published in that paper by 'A Protestant,' the press is as open to you and them as it is to me. If you write a reply to the paragraph which you have quoted, I shall, if you please, give it a place in an early number of The Protestant.—I am your most obedient servant, (Signed) W. M'GAVIN.

37, Virginia Street, August 1st, 1818.
REV. ANDREW SCOTT.'

"In his letter, M'Gavin was thus neither denying the implication to Mr Scott, nor venturing to assert that that application was just, but giving that shuffling reply natural to a man conscious of guilt. However, as he did not give a pointed answer, Mr Scott properly wrote him again: 'Sir,—Your letter of the 1st instant is no answer to mine of the 31st July, containing a copy of the correspondence which accompanied it. I asked no answer or explanations for my flock: it was for myself as an individual; and the only question was, whether you meant and alluded to me in the paragraph of the letter referred to? In that paragraph, I did, and do still, consider myself particularly pointed at. I was no party to, nor any way concerned with, the publication of any of the letters that appeared in the Chronicle. I never saw them till I read them in that paper; and I consider it due to myself, and to the situation which I fill, to require an explanation from the author of the paragraph I quoted. I, therefore, still expect that your honour and character as a gentleman will convince you of the propriety of giving a direct answer to my query, viz., Whether or not you alluded to me in the paragraph referred to?

'As I will be some days at this place, where I was obliged to come this morning, please send your answer to the shop of Mr Charles J. A. De Monti, Argyle Street, and they will have the goodness to forward it, as I do not leave this till Saturday.—I am your most obedient servant, (Signed) ANDREW SCOTT.

Gourock, Aug. 3d, 1818.'

"What was the answer to this? It was the following holograph note from Mr M'Gavin: 'Mr M'Gavin has no private answer to Mr Scott farther than he has already given.

'37, Virginia Street, Aug. 5, 1818.'

"He had no private answer. I think that he ought to have had a private answer, and that no person, with the feeling of a gentleman, would have declined such answer. Although he had no private answer, yet he at that time meditated that public response, which he has since made resound all over Scotland, and in consequence of which this action was brought.

"The answer which he gave was this. He had lain by, without ever putting forth the charge of extortion during the whole time the chapel was building—he did not bring it even after the chapel was built, until he chose to take amiss this publication about the Oratorio,—and I refer to this unworthy cause of what afterwards took place, as proof that this man was not actuated by those godly purposes to which he now ascribes his conduct, but by a spirit of hostility and of pique. The public answer he meditated was this. He had formerly written the paragraph I read to you under the title of The Protestant, and he now advertised in the newspapers and otherwise, that the letters under the title of The Protestant were to be discontinued in the newspaper, but that the same, and other papers, with similar sentiments, were to form a weekly paper, to be called The Protestant. Accordingly there was such a publication; and I have now to call your attention to the public answer given under the title of A Protestant to this injured pursuer by the defender.

"The Protestant, a copy of which I hold in my hand, was printed weekly, the profits of it devoted to religious purposes. Part First contains what was published in the Glasgow Chronicle. So he begins this work by giving additional publicity to what he had been first challenged for. He so begins The Protestant, and then gives a garbled and pretended copy of what followed. Then, having got this done, in his eighth number he breaks out in the extraordinary way which you will see mentioned in the first Issue, about the middle of the second page. He says, 'I did not point at him.' You would imagine that he was going to deny Mr Scott was guilty of extortion here. 'I did not point at him as the person who was exclusively employed in the work of extorting money from the poor; I did not know how many agents were engaged weekly in that pious undertaking; I do not know whether Mr Scott be the only priest that officiated while the chapel was building, or whether he be the only one that officiates in it at present. The house that is building immediately west of the chapel, and which is, it is said, intended for the manse, will be large enough to accommodate a dozen of priests while they remain unmarried, as they must always do; from which I infer that he either has, or intends to have, abundant assistance in milking and managing his flock.

"'It is doubtful how far he exhibits the character of a faithful pastor, while he seems to care only for himself; he asked no answer or explanations for his flock, it was for himself as an individual. One at least of his flock had been severely attacked and exposed, as guilty of a piece of shameful imposition, equal to a forgery, on the name of Luther. Fearing, perhaps, that this would also be applied to him, he takes care to let me know that he had no hand in the controversy. This is very well, and I hope he will thank me for making it public; but he ought to have some mercy on the guilty one of his flock. If he asked no explanation for him, he ought to demand explanation from him; he ought to put him on a course of severe penance for the good of his soul, for certainly he was guilty of a greater crime than that of eating flesh on Friday. If no such penance is enjoined, the priest ought to be held as consenting to his crime, or thinking very lightly of it.

"'I shall resume this subject in my next number, and give some examples to confirm what I wrote about money being extorted from poor persons, for the purpose of building the Popish chapel.'

"You will observe, that these words, (they seem to me at least to) contain a direct and public intimation, that Mr Scott was one at least of the persons who was guilty of robbery and extortion. The words imply, I do not say you are the only one; I am writing here as a Protestant; and although the law protects the Catholic hierarchy, (and although men of sense and liberality are agreed, that wherever a religion is tolerated by the law, it should be tolerated by all, so as to be respected by the private conduct of Protestants;) yet, I say, I am a Protestant, and I will calumniate all the body of Roman Catholics: and what I say is, you are not the only priest there who has been guilty of extortion and robbery.

"In page third of the second Issue, he gives the examples he threatens. 'If it be not true that money was extorted for building the Popish chapel by the fear of future punishment, from persons who had scarcely bread for their families, or clothes to cover them, why is it that neither Mr Scott,'—(there was no necessity for naming him if he was not alluded to,)—'nor any of his people, have publicly denied the charges insinuated in the obnoxious paragraph which he has quoted from my letter?' (Concealing from the public, that this charge had been denied in private to him by Mr Scott.) 'If it be not true, I should like to see it publicly disclaimed, and if any one had sent me a disavowal, duly authenticated, I should have given it publicity. But, in fact, the thing is too notorious to be denied. It is not a thing of a thousand miles distance, or a hundred years old, else, I doubt not, it would be publicly and unanimously disavowed by all Papists, and every document produced to prove it would be pronounced a forgery. The people in Glasgow are not prepared to refuse the evidence of their own senses, at least with regard to money matters.' He goes on: 'Even the Papists in Glasgow are not insensible of the evidence of their own empty stomachs, and the clamours of their hungry children, when they were obliged to give weekly so many of their hard earned pence for the building of the chapel; and if the facts were denied,'—mark these words: the defender says, he did not accuse Mr Scott of doing any thing but using that influence which clergymen have over their flock, yet he says, 'Even the Papists in Glasgow are not insensible to the evidence of their own empty stomachs, and the clamours of their hungry children, when they were obliged to give weekly so many of their hard earned pence, for the building of the chapel; and if the facts were denied, hundreds of witnesses would rise up among themselves to confirm them.'

"'The chapel must have cost as much money as would have built three comfortable houses sufficiently large. It is well known, that the bulk of the adherents of the Romish church here, are poor labouring people; and it is not denied that the necessary funds, with the exception of a small sum from some very liberal Protestants, were raised among the people themselves. There was a sort of poll-tax imposed upon the members, according to their real or supposed circumstances. This tax was levied with no small rigour: and, during a period of great commercial distress, it must undoubtedly have pressed heavily upon many poor persons, who were not left the choice of giving or not giving, but who were taught that nothing less than the salvation of their souls depended upon their paying the tax.' They were taught that. Now there was no person there, as we shall show, except Mr Scott, to whom this passage could apply. The defender, therefore, must be held as saying, they were so taught by Mr Scott.

"Then he says—(The words are not quoted in the Issues. I quote them in explanation. At present, however, I am mistaken. You will find what I am going to read at the bottom of page third of the Issues.) 'In my last Number, I promised to give some examples to confirm what I wrote, about money being extorted from poor persons, for the purpose of building the Popish chapel.' Then he says, 'I find no fault with the Romish sect for building a place of worship for themselves. They have legally as good a right to do so, as any other sect that is not established by law. Had they, of their own accord, agreed to erect a comfortable and commodious building, and had they contributed voluntarily, according to their ability, for the purpose; no reasonable man would have found fault, however much he might pity those who were so blinded by superstition, as to give their money for the support of a system which is inimical to their own happiness. Still, however, had it been a voluntary thing, they would have been acting like freeborn British subjects; and had they been content with a building merely comfortable and commodious, they would have shown themselves possessed of some measure of common sense. But, as I shall show presently, there was a heavy tax imposed upon the people without their consent; and all who submitted to this became, in fact, the vassals or slaves of their tax-masters. They stood no longer on the high and independent ground which every British subject is entitled to occupy:—their property, the hard earned fruit of their labour, was at the arbitrary disposal of persons over whom they had no control, and who would not deign to consult them with regard to its application.'

"In the private letter that Mr Scott had written to the defender, Mr Scott said, the words published, which he referred to in his letter, must have applied to him, as he had taken an active part in the building of this edifice. The Protestant says, 'Besides, nothing less, it seems, would suffice to gratify the vanity of him, or them, who had the charge of the money so extorted from the people, than a splendid edifice, equal, at least, to some ancient cathedral; or, to use the words of Amicus Veritatis, a house resembling 'as much as possible the majesty of that God, to whose service it was to be dedicated.' I need not stop at present to show that this could not be a place intended for Christian worship; for it must be only an idol that can find a likeness or resemblance in wood and stone, carved according to the art of the craftsman. My present business is with the enormous expense of this building; and I do not hesitate to repeat, as an assertion, what I formerly put as a question, whether it was not built, in a great measure, at the expense of a poor, and, in some instances, of a starving people? I go upon the supposition, that what was levied under the pretext of building the chapel, was actually applied to that object; for that is what many of the contributors themselves must take for granted; and so far as I know, no doubt exists with regard to the faithfulness of the application.'

"He says, at top of page fourth, 'While the chapel was a-building, the people, while they yet met in their old place of worship, were assured by their ghostly father'—(The term is probably used as having a ludicrous and contumelious appearance, though he adds in a note, 'This phrase is not used as a term of reproach. Ghostly is the old English word for spiritual; and, according to the Douay Catechism, ghostly father is the title by which the clergy choose to be called.') He says, 'Assured by their ghostly father, that such of them as fell behind in their payments should not enjoy church privileges. What was this, but extorting money by the fear of future punishment? and, from the condition of many of those from whom it was so extorted, who can doubt that they had often scarcely food for their families, or clothes to cover them? Every one knows in what estimation Papists regard the privileges of their church. To be denied these, is the same as to be denied the salvation of their souls. The poor, therefore, were told, in language sufficiently plain, that if the chapel tax was not punctually paid, they should suffer the pains of purgatory, or even hell itself.'

"'That this tax was extorted, and not always paid voluntarily, even from the fear of purgatory, is evident from the following fact:—There were a number of Papists employed, while the chapel was a-building, in one of the public works in the suburbs. These, it seems, were very unwilling to pay the tax. Application was therefore made to the manager, that he would retain, in his own hands, a portion of their weekly earnings to assist in building the chapel; for, as the applicant informed him, he could not trust the people themselves with the payment of their dues. The proprietors of the work, much to their honour, refused to comply with their request, rightly judging, that the labourer was entitled to the whole reward of his labour, without any deduction whatever. This is but one instance of the kind; but it is enough to show the manner in which money was extorted, without the consent of the people themselves, when by any means the collectors for the chapel could lay their hands upon their property.

"'I shall proceed to give a few more facts on this subject. The reader may rely on their authenticity. I could, indeed, give the names of the parties concerned; but I do not choose to do so, unless I shall be judicially called upon. I have been informed that some of my Papist neighbours talk big about my having libelled them; they even speak of a legal prosecution against me, for what I have written on the subject of their extorting money from the poor; and they will compel me, they say, to answer Mr Scott's question, whether or not I referred to him as the person who did so? I have no doubt the Papists of the present day are very willing to employ the old Popish argument of fines and imprisonments, and worse, if they could, against all whom they cannot otherwise confute; and if they had the Inquisition at command, they would, no doubt, silence me. It seems there is no resource left them, but to appeal to some criminal tribunal; for they find that arguments and facts are all against them. It is my happiness, however, to live in a country in which there is no Inquisition; and, therefore, I shall, without fear, produce my facts, as I have hitherto done my arguments, leaving the reader to judge how far my assertions are proved by them:'—

"Then he mentions at top of page fifth: 'A man who now lives out of the city, was assessed in a certain weekly sum for building the chapel. During the dull trade, he fell back with regard to his payments. His family, however, continued to increase, and when he went to his ghostly father'—(Remember that is just a paraphrase of the name Mr Scott)—'to get a child baptized, he was asked how he stood with regard to his payments? He confessed what he could not deny, that during the hard times he had fallen behind. He was ordered to go about his business; and told, that his child should not be baptized, till he had paid every farthing that he was due. Before he was able to raise the necessary sum, the child died; and the father was left to suffer all the misery which such a circumstance would occasion to one who considered baptism necessary to the salvation of his child.'

"Then he goes on to another paragraph, which I read as explaining the Issues. This charge against a clergyman for the conduct of a father with regard to his child, in point of malignity, exceeds any thing I have ever seen in print. He goes on and gives an account of the great efficacy which the members of the Catholic church ascribe to baptism. 'This is a very serious matter in the Church of Rome. A child that dies unchristened must be lost. It is a generally received doctrine of that church, that baptism is necessary to salvation; and, in cases of extremity, where a new-born infant was likely to die before a priest could arrive, the midwife was authorised to baptize it. The sacrament of baptism is understood to regenerate the child, and to turn it from being a member of Satan into a child of God. A child that dies unbaptized can have no place in the kingdom of heaven, and cannot even have the privilege of Christian burial in consecrated ground. A medical friend has related to me the following fact, which occurred in his own practice, and which shows how acutely the feelings of even a mother are alive to this subject:—He had attended a poor woman, who found herself dying while pretty far advanced in pregnancy. She exacted of him a promise, that after her death, he would open her body, and separate the body of her child. He performed his promise, without at first thinking that she had any particular meaning in exacting it; but learning that she had been a Papist, he inquired of her friends, who were in attendance, if there was understood to be any religious meaning in what he had done?' We do not believe there is any truth in this anecdote. He goes on to say, 'They assured him that the woman could not have died in peace, had she not been assured that her unchristened child should be separated from her, for otherwise she could not have received Christian burial, and she could not go to heaven, if the unchristened body of her child remained in her. The Church of Rome cherishes such ideas of baptism, and of the absolute necessity of it, in order to the salvation of children; yet there was a priest in Glasgow, who would not baptize a child because its father was a few shillings in arrears of an arbitrarily imposed tax. Upon his own principles, the priest was, for the sake of a few shillings, guilty of the everlasting perdition of that child. The soul of one child is more precious than a thousand worlds; but Popery cares not how many thousand souls shall perish, if it can but gratify its own avarice and ambition.'

"I shall not attempt to add any force to this statement. I say but this,—if it is true, nothing is too bad for Mr Scott,—if not proved to be true, your verdict will tell us if any thing can be too bad for Mr M'Gavin. He says, 'Most sincerely do I wish that all Papists, and especially all fathers and mothers, would forsake their priests, and come to Christ, the friend of sinners, and the friend of children. If they believe in him, they shall receive all heavenly blessings for themselves; and as for their children, they shall find that he imposes no such conditions, with regard to their salvation, as the hard-hearted priests impose. Such priests care for neither parents nor children, farther than as they can extort money from them. They will let them perish if they cannot pay for their salvation.'

"Then after all this commentary, he goes on, upon page fifth of the Issues,—'I can, if necessary, give the name of a poor man'—(he will not give his name to-day, you will see)—'who subsisted partly on charity, and partly by carrying coals, and whose very clothing, such as it was, was furnished by some benevolent individuals, from whom not less than six shillings was exacted, at one time, to assist in building the Popish chapel. I can give the name of another, residing at Calton, who is in bad health, and who has sent several times for his ghostly father to visit him in his distress; but the said father will not go to him, because he has fallen behind in his payments. There is no comfort, it seems, for the poor. This individual may die without confession, without absolution, and he may perish for ever; because he cannot pay a certain sum to defray the expense of the chapel.'

"Then he mentions: 'There were two young men, apprentices, each of whose earnings did not exceed four shillings a week. Out of this miserable pittance, one was obliged to pay sixpence, the other ninepence a fortnight. I believe, in the estimation of those who had lately the distribution of public bounty, in a time of great distress, four shillings a week was understood to be the lowest sum by which a grown person could support life; what then must have been the condition of two hard working young men, who could earn no more, and who were obliged to give so large a portion of it to defray the expense of the ridiculous gewgaws of the chapel in Clyde Street?'

"Next page he says, 'I could give the instance of a poor woman, who, though she had paid as long as she was able, yet, falling behind, she durst not gratify herself with a sight of the new chapel after it was finished. She frankly told her neighbours, that she did not dare to go, till she was able to pay up what she was due. She was, of course, deprived of all the ordinances of the sanctuary, as it is called; she was left destitute of all the consolations of her religion; she was left to live without comfort, and to die without hope, because she could not pay the chapel tax.'

"Then he says, 'The following case presents a ghostly father in a more favourable light, and exhibits one of that holy order not quite destitute of human feelings. Some time ago, this father was called to visit one of his people, who was dangerously ill. One of his first questions, as usual, was, How he stood with regard to his payments? He was answered, That, owing to the state of his family, he had fallen behind. The visitor seemed not a little surprised, that the sick person should have the assurance to send for him, while his dues were not all paid up, and reproved him very warmly for it. He then asked, if there was any money in the house? and, being informed that there was only one shilling, he demanded and got it. His attention was then turned a little to the case of the sick person; but he soon resumed the subject of money, and gave back the shilling, on condition that the whole that was due should be paid as soon as possible.'

"Then there is a passage, which is not quoted in the Issues, and which I refer to, for explaining those passages that are quoted in the Issues.—'A friend states to me a case that came within his own knowledge, of a poor old man, who had paid liberally while the chapel was a-building; but, being struck with a palsy, he was rendered unable to do any thing for himself. He was supplied by some humane persons; one of whom advised him to go to his priest, and gave him a letter to him; but, alas! there was nothing to be had there. The priest was deaf to all his entreaties, and he might have starved for anything he would do for him.'

"Then he says, as in the Issues, 'I have more facts at the service of Mr Scott, if he shall think these insufficient to confirm my assertion;' stating those assertions, not as mere words he had heard, repeating them as facts, and throwing them in the face of the public and Mr Scott as facts, showing Mr Scott as guilty of extortion. And then he says, 'But I shall conclude this Number, by asking him some questions, to which, I hope, he will write an answer; and, if he does so, I will readily give it a place in The Protestant. Indeed, it is my earnest desire that he would defend himself and his cause, for that is in danger of becoming a tame controversy that is all on one side. I ask Mr Scott, whether he did not, on a certain day, denounce some of his people by name, before his whole congregation, for falling behind in the weekly impost? If he did not pronounce very awful curses against the unhappy individuals, and threaten to consign their souls to everlasting punishment, if the money was not paid? I ask, if he did not refer to others, besides those whom he named, as also in arrears, and threaten them with similar judgment, if they did not speedily pay? I request Mr Scott to answer these questions; and say, whether or not such anathemas have proceeded from his lips; and whether he thinks cursing his people, be the duty of a minister of the gospel of peace.'

"I need not explain to you, that Mr Scott did not answer those questions; because, in the first place, he thought they were not asked in the spirit of conciliation, truth, or friendship;—in the next place, he knew, that if he were to begin a paper war with such a person of hostile dispositions, he would plunge himself into wretchedness all the days of his life, as long as this war should be going on.

"Then there was a pause from September, 1818, till September, 1819; a year during which Mr Scott was silent, and trusted that the calumnies with which he had been assailed, would have died away. Such was the impression of the place, that the thing would have died away; yet, to my astonishment, after a pause of fourteen months, without any act to provoke the attack, M'Gavin, who had let the subject drop, from the IX. Number of The Protestant, breaks out again, in the LXXII. Number, into matter forming the third Issue. The story is awful; and I shall not read it to you. He prints a letter from Mr Sym, Clerk of the Town's Hospital of Glasgow, a defender to-day, in which Sym states a discovery of extortion by Mr Scott. M'Gavin, certain he could not be of the truth of this story, which was not true, lends himself as a party to its propagation; and he published this statement. The essence of the statement is contained in page eighth of this Issue. '20th Aug. 1819. Betty Dochie, alias Widow Hanlin, 44, Bridgegate, aged 36, has three children: Helen, 5 years and 3 months; Michael, 3 years; and Alice, 8 months. Has thirty shillings quarterly from the Hospital; no other supply. She strips feathers; has three other children variously employed. Her husband died in January last; had, before his death, given to Mr Scott four pounds; but had fallen back in his payments, in consequence of which, Mr Scott refused to recommend the children for admission to the Popish Schools. Nor would he baptize the infant, which was only two months old at its father's death, till the mother pawned a pair of blankets, for five shillings, and borrowed three shillings from a friend, and paid Mr Scott eight shillings; partly for christening the child, and partly for her husband's arrears. She says she will declare the above to be truth before God and man. I am, &c.

(Signed) 'WILLIAM SYM, Clerk.'

"The extortion is represented as upon a woman; a woman who was receiving public charity, and obliged to pawn her blankets for five shillings, and to borrow three shillings, in order to pay Mr Scott eight shillings; and the extortion practised against her at the time she became a widow.

"Then Mr M'Gavin goes on to say, that he had heard 'when the widow called at the Hospital for her half-quarter's allowance, she stated, that, about a month before that Mr Scott had called upon her, and that, without upbraiding her for divulging the story which I have given above, he returned to her the eight shillings, which he had extorted from her for the baptism of her child, &c.; and farther, that he had given her 12 lbs. of meal per week for three weeks; and that, moreover, he had charged her to tell this to no man;' that is to say, to tell to no man Mr Scott had returned the money he had extorted.

"And then the defender goes on with the usual spirit of conciliation and charity by which he is actuated. 'I hope Mr Scott will believe me, when I say that this is the best thing I ever heard of him; and as I am assured that he had been informed that the widow's case had been communicated to me, he will allow me to congratulate myself as the happy instrument, of not only relieving the widow, but also of producing a benevolent feeling in his mind, to which, perhaps, he had been too long a stranger. If Mr Scott be possessed of human feelings, he must have had more pleasure in returning these eight shillings to the poor widow, and in giving her a little meal, than in the many thousand pounds which have been extorted from persons almost as poor as she. Nay, I will venture to assert, that he never felt so much pleasure in contemplating the lofty minarets of his chapel, or the spacious rooms of his manse, with the extortions, by means of which they were reared, as he felt when he put the silver into the widow's hands.

"'This, however, is not the first instance of restitution that is on record. The reader will recollect a case, in my IX. Number, in which a whole shilling was restored, after being extorted from a poor sick person; and if more instances had been communicated to me, I should gladly have recorded them. It is pleasing to see that the work of restitution has begun, and proceeded so far; because this is one evidence that the extortioner has begun to repent; and though the extortion itself has produced nearly twenty thousand pounds; and though the amount of the restitution is, upon the whole, only nine shillings in money, and four pecks and a half of oatmeal; we must not be discouraged, but hope for the best, knowing that the greatest things in the world, even Rome itself, arose out of small beginnings.

"'Protestants have no idea of the immense sums of money which are levied upon Papists by their ghostly instructors.'

"Those are the statements upon which this action was brought; and, before pointing out to you their peculiar character of injuriousness, I at present submit to you, as too clear to require any evidence, that the words I have read, charge Mr Scott, personally, with the crime of extortion. The defender has said, that all men who ask charity, or subscriptions for any purpose, from their friends, because they get from them, by argument and solicitation, what they cannot, or do not choose otherwise to give, may be said to be guilty of extortion. I need not say, this is a hypocritical and contemptible quibble. Mr Scott is mentioned by name, as guilty of extortion, in twenty of the passages I have read to you; and who can doubt his identity, when in the very defences to-day, those very facts are stated as true of Mr Scott? Mr M'Gavin cannot be allowed, with inconsistency to say, I do not mean you; and then to say, those facts are true of you. I am ready to poll every individual in the west of Scotland: no man, woman, or child, there, ever doubted those words applied to Mr Scott, and to him alone.

"Observe, they do not accuse him merely of one or two specific acts of extortion or robbery from widow Hanlin, the two apprentices, &c. The charge is a general charge, that, throughout the whole course of the building of that chapel, he was guilty of this as a general crime; and specific instances are given as instances, not as exhausting the charge. No honest or intelligent man can doubt that it is a general charge of calumny that is made against this person's official conduct.

"Then observe, there is no foundation in the defence M'Gavin has sometimes indicated that he was to set up, that those passages are palliated or explained away by other passages in The Protestant. We wish and call upon him to read those passages if he can. We are not entitled to charge him by picking out passages.

You must look at the context, at the general nature of this book. I say, instead of palliation, an additional sting is put into the charge, from where the statements proceeded from, and from where they were directed, and from the false and injurious calumnies with which all the statements are mixed up.

"And those calumnies are not stated in the way they would have been, if the defender believed them to be true, and was actuated by a sincere love of justice. If he believed Mr Scott was guilty of extortion, and could call a hundred persons to prove this, he was bound to make his complaint in a regular form to the courts of his country. Mr Scott is not entitled to swindle any man. M'Gavin was bound to ask what defence he had for his conduct. Am I entitled to charge you with swindling, and never to let you know the facts upon which I ground the charge? Year after year, and month after month, M'Gavin so charged Mr Scott before the public. He began by newspapers, then by a publication called The Protestant, a name sufficient of itself to attract the eye and attention in that town; and there was no device he did not adopt that was possible to give circulation to this calumny.

"Those charges are injurious—they apply to Mr Scott generally—and they are not explained away by other parts of the book.

"Then, what is the main defence which is set up against this action? The defence, which alone will occasion to you the smallest trouble to-day. I am reading that of Mr M'Gavin—for the other defenders hardly make any defence at all. 'For a considerable time past, a periodical work has been published in Glasgow, under the title of "The Protestant," the object of which is to vindicate the principles and doctrines of the Reformation. The pursuer, Mr Scott, or his friends, have attempted to counteract the tendency of this publication by another work, called "The Catholic Vindicator," in which they have endeavoured to support the system of Popery, and to asperse the doctrines and characters of Protestants.' I shall show you, by and by, Mr Scott had nothing more to do with the Vindicator than either you or I. 'Much personal abuse has been thrown out against the defender, Mr M'Gavin, in this work. This controversy has been carried on in this form for two or three years; but the pursuer, or his friends, who seem to be aware how little impression they are making on the public by their Vindicator, have magnanimously resolved to try what can be done by bringing this controversy before a court of law.' I have stated to you, there was no controversy, except where Mr M'Gavin had injuriously and maliciously calumniated Mr Scott. 'The defender, Mr M'Gavin, has already met them before the public, in the form in which it is certainly most expedient that such matters should be discussed; but, as they now wish to take refuge in a court of law, he has no objection to follow them there also. He might, upon very solid grounds, object to the relevancy of the present action;'—observe these words—but, as he observes that the summons charges 'The Protestant' with statements that are false and malicious; and as he is prepared to support, by evidence, every statement therein made, he waves any objection to the relevancy of the summons, and is willing to join issue with the pursuer as to the facts and statements of which he has had the hardihood to complain.

"No defence can be more natural or more honourable to Mr M'Gavin than this. It is the defence which becomes him as a man, and as a gentleman. 'The stories are true,' is the only defence such a man can make; and accordingly he says he is prepared to support, by evidence, every statement that is mentioned in this Protestant and in these Issues.

"Under the forms of pleading in this Court, as I am sure will be shown you from the proper quarter at the proper time, when a defender says he will prove his defence, he is bound to mention his statements as specifically as if he, in reference to these statements, were the pursuer. The Court, therefore, called upon Mr M'Gavin to say what were the facts he meant to prove. He gave in a very thick and formidable paper. A great number of statements, extended to a long period of time, might have embraced half the town with the evidence. When he was required to state a little more specifically what he meant, so specifically as to be intelligible, and to give the names, times, circumstances, he attempted to do so during a year; but the whole fabric crumbled from him inch by inch, till at last the charges resolved into the four last cases mentioned in the Issues before you. You will perceive them beginning with the word 'or.' The first Issues regard the calumnies against Mr Scott, and then come the Issues in defence.

"OR,

"IV. WHETHER, on or about the month of October, 1814, the pursuer did refuse to baptize the child of Henry Courtney, labourer, lately in Anderston, and now in Cowcaddens, Glasgow, a person of the Roman Catholic persuasion, and one of the contributors to the Roman Catholic chapel aforesaid, because he, Courtney, was in arrears of his contribution, until the said Courtney should pay the said arrears to the collectors for the chapel? And whether at or about Easter, 1815, the pursuer did refuse confession to the said Courtney, because he had not paid his contribution to the said chapel?

"V. WHETHER, about six years ago, the pursuer did refuse to baptize the child of Philip M'Geechie, now in Manchester, late residenter in Glasgow, a person of the Roman Catholic persuasion, and a member of the pursuer's congregation, because the said M'Geechie was in arrears in his contribution to the said chapel?

"VI. WHETHER, in the year 1814, the pursuer did apply to Mr Haughton Fleming, or to Mr Bowman Fleming, who carried on a dye-work in Hutcheson Town, Glasgow, to retain in their hands a portion of the weekly earnings of such Catholics as were employed in their works, to be applied towards building said Roman Catholic chapel?

"VII. WHETHER, on or about the month of June, 1818, the pursuer did refuse to baptize the child of John Drain, weaver in Duke Street, Glasgow, one of the contributors to the Catholic chapel aforesaid, because the said Drain was then in arrears of his contribution to said chapel?

"I shall tell you, by and by, our statement as to these Issues. At present I have to say, the only defence you can this day attend to is proof of those four individual cases—and it is in consequence of those four acts, that Mr M'Gavin maintains this extraordinary proposition, that he is entitled to blast the reputation, and ruin the happiness of Mr Scott during the rest of his life—and all that is in consequence of these four acts.

"Observe, there is not any of them but one that is mentioned in the libel itself. The whole of these are new cases coming to Mr M'Gavin's knowledge after he had committed the calumny, and only raked out of the filth after his controversy, and after he had been put to the wall by the Court upon his own calumnies. He has deserted, with a single exception, all his assertions;—and Mr Scott stands at present in the cruel situation of defending himself against a general calumny, upon statements which the calumniator did not know of at the time he uttered his calumny.

"The only part of the case that can require any delay or trouble to-day is, as to those cases—and, that you may understand what Mr Scott says about them, I must beg of you to attend to the general system by which the contributions to this chapel were levied.

"I have already stated to you, that I think there was no great sin in Mr Scott taking an interest about the building of the Catholic Chapel. If he had been careless about that great work, I should have thought very little of him indeed. The law does not impose a contribution for any church except the established one—it is therefore the more incumbent, as a moral duty, upon all other sects to maintain their own establishments;—and if I could name the thing that was most proper for a man in Mr Scott's situation to look to, as a moral and Christian duty, it was to forward all in his power whatever was calculated to promote the education and moral good of the Catholics in Glasgow. Mr Scott, instead of denying, glories and boasts in it,—says he felt warmly and zealously in that work, and did every thing he could for it, in consistence with the morality, liberality, and benevolence of a gentleman. And what could such a man do but push on the work with the zeal of an honest and active man? But you are surely not to mistake this for the offence of which he has been charged by Mr M'Gavin. If he has great influence, as it is said all Catholic clergymen have, over their flock, such influence, so used in a lawful way, to procure subscriptions for a church that was necessary, no man can say this was wrong.

"It was pretty well known who were Catholics, and what was their number, about this time. Mr Scott did not go about among them himself—but, all the respectable persons in his congregation, forty, fifty, or sixty, were named collectors. Each took a part of the town or congregation. You will see them here to-day. They found who were willing or able to subscribe. When they found a rich shabby fellow, they perhaps did not think it wrong to urge him, and reason with him a little on the subject of the subscription. I know it frequently happens to myself, that a collector of subscriptions for charitable or other purposes says, I have given a great deal too little, and stands and exhorts me to give more. Having ascertained, in this way, what the persons were willing or able to give, they took down their names. It was agreed the contribution should be once a fortnight—and there are books here which show the quarterly contributions made by every individual. Mr Scott was one of the collectors—not one of the principal ones. He had no particular individual charge, except of the persons in his own list.

"The general results of this collection appear to me to be very edifying, in reference to the general charge of extortion, and that religious consolations and ordinances were withheld from every Catholic in the place who did not contribute. What are the facts? I perceive the Catholics now amount to between nine and ten thousand. At the date of the contributions, they were about eight thousand two hundred and forty-five. That is a statement made by a person well versant in these matters, who took up the list. A number of them drew off, and never paid any thing. Therefore, the whole number of the subscribers to the chapel was four thousand and thirty-seven—so that there was not one half of the Catholic population of the place subscribed a single farthing.

"The total sum was from fifteen to twenty thousand pounds, and that was not all from Glasgow. The whole at Glasgow, during the three years and a half, was five thousand nine hundred and thirteen pounds, including the sum of four hundred and twenty-six pounds—so there remains as subscribed by all the Catholics in the West of Scotland, five thousand four hundred and eighty-seven pounds,

(and four hundred and twenty-six pounds) subscribed chiefly by Protestants.

"If you suppose all the subscriptions equal, dividing the sum subscribed among those who subscribed, the sum got by these extortions would amount to a penny three farthings a week. If you deduct, as you must, from the lower orders all the subscriptions above ten pounds, then it was scarcely a penny a week."

Lord Gillies—"From your data, is not a halfpenny nearer the thing, than a penny?"

Mr Cockburn—"Yes. So that the amount, at the very worst that can be stated, as to this system of extortion, is, that they paid a halfpenny a week.

"The lists are very minute—there were different classes,—some paid ten pounds, some five, and some one pound. A prodigious majority of the subscriptions were under five shillings.

"Observe that plain and glaring fact. Allowing Mr Scott to have run riot in Glasgow, like a lion seeking whom he might devour, and devouring all who came in his way,—of great influence over his flock—the calumny amounts to this, that for building a chapel necessary for his flock, the amount of the extortion was a halfpenny a week.

"Before I go on to particulars, as to those four Issues, I shall say a word or two on the way M'Gavin alleges the extortions were exacted, viz., Mr Scott's withholding the ordinances of religion. The defender asserts, that the pursuer refused to baptize, or confess, those who would not subscribe.

"Now, Gentlemen, there is a list kept of all who confess at Easter, when it is reckoned a matter of duty to communicate. I observe that in one year, about two thousand did so. And of those, how many contributed regularly to this chapel? There were three hundred in arrear,—and that is a fact which pretty well disposes of the charge, that he refused to confess persons who were in arrear.

"And then, as to the refusal to give baptism, I see there was a baptismal register for 1816, the year in which the chapel was finished. Of those whose children were baptized in that year, there were 108 who never gave, during the whole time of the subscription, five shillings; and a very considerable number, about 60, had children baptized that year, who never contributed a single farthing one way or other. So that, in that year, 108 had children baptized, who never paid a shilling; and sixty, who never subscribed any thing at all.

"Those are the facts, as to the general system of extortion; and I think Mr Scott thus stands on a very proud ground, as to this charge of extortion. I doubt if you will find any Catholic clergyman on the globe,—I doubt if you will find any Protestant, who, in such circumstances, eight or ten years after the thing took place, could produce such evidence of the general cleanness of his hands. And this is taking the case in its general aspect.

"Then we come to the specific cases. But, first, let me mention, that, of these specific cases, there was only one originally mentioned in The Protestant;—and, observe, there are many things stated in this Protestant, as to which Mr M'Gavin offers no proof to-day. Look to the Issues, and you will see Mr Scott is charged with habitually refusing to visit the sick, who did not make the payments wanted for building the chapel. You remember the case mentioned in the Issues for the pursuer, of a sick person having been required to pay a shilling, that being the whole money in his house; which, however, was returned, on condition that the whole that was due would be paid as soon as possible. Now there is not one of the defender's Issues founded upon refusal to visit the sick. And, if any thing is proved, it will be shown to you, that, of all the clergymen in the west, Mr Scott was most notorious for the regular performance of that duty.

"And, as to denouncing persons in the congregation by name, the defender has given up all offer of proof upon that charge. And he will not prove any one of the charges with the aggravations he states,—not one of the injurious commentaries with which he mixes them up. If I were to admit, that a person who got a child baptized, did pay towards the building of the chapel, that is not the impression the defender gave to the public,—he put the statement, and a commentary upon it, in the mouth of the vulgar,—there is always the charge of extortion and robbery. Those aggravations,—what the defender says as to the visitation of the sick, and the denouncing of persons in the congregation by name,—he does not ask leave this day to prove any one of them.

"What does he ask to prove? He says—his first Issue is, 'Whether on or about the month of October, 1814, the pursuer did refuse to baptize the child of Henry Courtney, labourer?'"—

"But first let me notice the case of widow Hanlin, forming the subject of the third Issue of the pursuer, in which it is stated as having been set forth by Mr M'Gavin, that she had thirty shillings quarterly from the Hospital,—no other supply; and that Mr Scott, having first extorted four pounds from her husband before his death, had, because some farther payments had not been made, refused to recommend her children for admission to the Popish schools; and to baptize an infant, two months old at its father's death, till the mother, by pawning blankets, and borrowing money, paid him eight shillings,—partly for christening the child, and partly for her husband's arrears. We hold that the defender is not entitled to go into that case. It is not one of the cases upon which he has asked a special Issue. But, although he is not entitled to go into it, as we know and believe he intends to make the attempt, I am bound to indicate to you, what is the truth of that statement. The truth is,—this poor man, Mr Hanlin, who is represented to have been dead at this time, was, in the first place, either not dead at all, —or, if he was, his death was not known, even to his own wife. In the next place, although in an hospital, he was a man of capital. He died worth more money than is possessed by nine-tenths of the labouring orders. When he died, we have evidence, that he had debtors in various parts of the town. He was in an hospital, not from poverty, but from the circumstances attending a fever that was raging in Glasgow; and he did die, but at the date of this transaction, his death was not known, even to his own wife. He was not of very good character—he did not live with his wife —he did not support her. A witness will tell you, Mr Scott did not know he was dead. He was understood to be better—and he died suddenly, in consequence of a drug he took by mistake. He had agreed to subscribe to the chapel, and instead of having given four pounds, he had only given sixteen shillings. He was thus greatly in arrear; and Mr Scott, about the time of the baptism of this child, did receive eight shillings. But he did not receive this from Mrs Hanlin. Hanlin himself directed a friend of his to get the money from a debtor of his; this friend paid it to Kerr, and Kerr paid it to Scott, as a contribution by Hanlin.

"First, then, there was no refusal to baptize this child of Mrs Hanlin's; who was not then a widow, or was not known to be so. Then, four pounds had not been paid, but only sixteen shillings. And Mrs Hanlin had not paid eight shillings. Mr Hanlin did it; and accordingly it is entered as a contribution by himself to that chapel.

"Soon after this, Mr Scott had gone to Edinburgh; and upon his return, he heard Hanlin was dead, and his widow at that time had got into an hospital. Mr Scott hearing the husband was dead, and the wife poor, did the meritorious, but dangerous charity,—the act of humanity, of paying back to the widow the money he had got from the husband. And, it was for this, Mr M'Gavin had the insanity to state, this was the best thing he ever knew of Mr Scott. M'Gavin stated this was done, not because Mr Scott had found the husband dead, and the widow poor; but that Mr Scott had been informed, that the widow's case had been communicated to him, Mr M'Gavin; he congratulates himself as the happy instrument, of not only relieving the widow, but also of producing a benevolent feeling in Mr Scott, to which he had been too long a stranger. He mentions, that Mr Scott had made restoration to the widow, and given her some meal per week,—and he says that he had charged her to tell this to no man.

"This story is chiefly of use in this way, that it gives a correct view of the truth of the other stories. Here was a woman living apart from her husband, who comes to get her child baptized. Her husband, about this time, gives a small payment towards the discharge of the arrears of his subscription for building the chapel,—and afterwards, from charity, the clergyman gives this payment back to the widow. Then what is the commentary? Husband dead—child wanted to be baptized—this refused — money demanded — blankets pawned to pay the money—and money afterwards returned by stealth, because the circumstances had come to the knowledge of Mr M'Gavin.

"There was a foundation for the story—there was the fact that eight shillings were paid about this time. What we complain of is, that Mr M'Gavin, instead of giving a true statement of the facts, was guilty of this piece of calumny,—of taking an insidious advantage of apparent truth, for the very purpose of rearing a structure of defamation and injurious calumny.

"Look what they say as to Henry Courtney. The Issue here is, 'whether on or about the month of October, 1814, the pursuer did refuse to baptize the child of Henry Courtney, labourer, lately in Anderston, and now in Cowcaddens, Glasgow, a person of the Roman Catholic persuasion, and one of the contributors to the Roman Catholic chapel, aforesaid; because he, Courtney, was in arrear of his contribution, until the said Courtney should pay the said arrears to the collectors for the chapel? And whether, at or about Easter, 1815, the pursuer did refuse confession to the said Courtney, because he had not paid his contribution to the said chapel?'

"The fact here, as to confession, is, that we have the confession book, both of 1814 and 1815, by which it appears that this man Courtney actually communicated. Therefore that last part of the statement in the Issue is unquestionably false.

"Then,—did Mr Scott refuse, in October, 1814, to baptize the child of this man? All we have to say upon this, consists in a denial of the fact. He did not then, or at any other time, refuse to baptize the child of Courtney.

"Sometime after this, Courtney wished a genteel seat in the chapel, having a great taste that way; but the seat afforded him was among the poor. He took this amiss, renounced the chapel, and has been hostile since to Mr Scott.

"Such has been the foundation for Mr M'Gavin's charge, after he was obliged to get cases for his defence. What Courtney will say, I cannot tell; but Mr Scott's defence is a positive denial of the statement,—and no evidence upon earth can prove it.

"The second case M'Gavin founds upon is,

'Whether, about six years ago, the pursuer did refuse to baptize the child of Philip M'Geechie, now in Manchester, late residenter in Glasgow, a person of the Roman Catholic persuasion, and a member of the pursuer's congregation; because the said M'Geechie was in arrear in his contribution to the said chapel?'

"In the first place, upon this case, the facts, so far as Mr Scott can recollect or gather them, were these: A long time ago, more than double six years, a person of the name of M'Kenzie, gifted with a variety of names in the course of his life, and another of the name of Robertson, came to Mr Scott, in a state of intoxication. Of course, they were refused at that time—they afterwards came back—the child was baptized; and it is positively denied, that there was any refusal, or any payment demanded, for withdrawing the refusal.

"You will find this transaction took place about 1808, and not about six years ago; and I need not tell you and the Court, that, if the defender meant to found upon cases, he was obliged to give accurate and specific circumstances.

"And then you will observe who is this Mr M'Geechie. The pursuer tells us, he is now in Manchester, and was then in Glasgow. We did what we could to find him—and nothing did Mr Scott wish, but to have him examined, not doubting his character was respectable. Accordingly most diligent search was made to find him. We sent all the way to Manchester, and at last did succeed in tracing him.

"Alas! half a dozen of different things have occurred regarding him. He was marked in the books of the Police of Glasgow, as an old offender. He was tried in the Court of Justiciary for a transportable offence, and acquitted, because the prosecutor had not taken all the aliases of his designation. He was latterly found in the jail of Lancaster, under a sentence of three years' imprisonment, convicted of issuing false coin. We saw at once he was inadmissible as a witness—and nothing in this case, I dare say, would induce the Crown to give him a pardon.

"So thus does Mr M'Gavin begin his cases with Courtney, who has quarrelled with Mr Scott, and then one who, he knew, could not be called here to contradict his statements.

"Then we go on to the next case, the only one mentioned in the original libel:—'Whether, in the year 1814, the pursuer did apply to Mr Haughton Fleming, or to Mr Bowman Fleming, who carried on a dyework in Hutchesontown, Glasgow, to retain, in their hands, a portion of the weekly earnings of such Catholics as were employed in their works, to be applied towards building the Roman Catholic Chapel.'

"I read what he says of this case in his libel, page fourth of the Issues. 'That this tax was extorted, and not always paid voluntarily, even from the fear of purgatory, is evident from the following fact:—There were a number of Papists employed, while the chapel was a-building, in one of the public works in the suburbs. These, it seems, were very unwilling to pay the tax. Application was therefore made to the manager, that he would retain, in his own hands, a portion of their weekly earnings, to assist in building the chapel; for, as the applicant informed him, he could not trust the people themselves with the payment of their dues. The proprietors of the work, much to their honour, refused to comply with the request, rightly judging that the labourer was entitled to the whole reward of his labour, without any deduction whatever. This is but one instance of the kind; but it is enough to show the manner in which money was extorted without the consent of the people themselves, when by any means the collectors for the chapel could lay their hands on their property.'

"In defence of this general statement, you are desired to try whether the pursuer Mr Scott applied to any of the Messrs Flemings to retain in their hands a portion of the weekly earnings of their Catholic workmen, to be applied towards building the Roman Catholic chapel. To that Mr Scott gives a most positive and triumphant denial. It happens that the defender has here condescended upon respectable names, who can be called as witnesses,—and those men will swear to you, that they never exchanged words in their lives with, and I am not sure they ever saw, Mr Scott. Mr Scott never spoke a word in his life to them; at all events, he never requested them to retain in their hand a portion of the weekly earnings of such Catholics as were employed at their work, to be applied towards building the Roman Catholic chapel. The fact is—for this story is not the pure invention of Mr M'Gavin—but what Mr Scott feels injurious to him, is, M'Gavin's taking hold of a fact, and then twisting it for an injurious purpose—Stevenson, who was manager to those Flemings, had asked Mr Scott to go to the workmen to see what they were disposed to give, and he heard the usual arguments used about the propriety of the measure. But Mr Scott never interfered in the least—he was a mere silent spectator, and never made a proposal of any such kind as that which he has been charged by Mr M'Gavin.

"I am wrong, I think, in stating he was present. I believe he was not even present when this person went to the manufactory. We must, at all events, adhere to the Issue, and find whether, in the year 1814, the pursuer did apply to either of the Messrs Flemings to retain in their hands any part of the earnings of their Catholic workmen, towards building the Roman Catholic chapel.

"Lastly, we come to the case of Mr John Drain: 'Whether, on or about the month of June, 1818, the pursuer did refuse to baptize the child of John Drain, weaver, in Duke Street, Glasgow, one of the contributors to the Catholic chapel aforesaid, because the said Drain was then in arrears of his contribution to said chapel.'

"Mr Scott could never have found out any thing about this Mr Drain merely from what is stated in the Issue—but that Issue is made out of a statement by Mr M'Gavin in his condescendence. So that the case we are called upon here to defend ourselves from, is the case of that John Drain,—and that child which Mr Scott refused to baptize, and which Bishop Paterson did baptize, was baptized at a time, that gentleman will tell you, he was in France. In the next place, we have the certificate of the person who did baptize the child—and it was neither the one nor the other of the gentlemen in question;—it was neither Mr Scott nor Bishop Paterson who baptized the child—but the child was baptized at Paisley, by a Roman Catholic clergyman at Paisley, of the name of M'Lachlan.

"So you have, as witnesses for the defender, Courtney, who felt insulted by being sent to a seat among the poor of the congregation. You have a person who has been convicted at Manchester—and now you have John Drain,—and where is he? There was, a few days ago, an application for John Drain, and if he do not come before you in chains, he will appear in the custody of officers of the law. He is an old offender, well known in the Police books of Glasgow. I know he is not convicted, and therefore his evidence must be received. But we are entitled to say, Mr Scott had good reasons, independent of non-payment of contributions to the chapel, to be displeased at this person's conduct. This John Drain, I cannot tell how many wives he has living—you will hear of two that are living. There is distinct evidence of his desertion from the service of His Majesty—he has been notorious to the Police—and, lastly, he comes here with two officers. And it is of importance to Mr Scott, that Mr Scott had very good reasons for refusing the baptism, independent of the grounds stated by the defender.

"Thus, Mr M'Gavin is driven to desperation in these his defences; for in three out of four of the cases he has selected, the witnesses are inadmissible or objectionable. If he could have fixed charges of extortion by Mr Scott on persons in Botany Bay, these would have been the men he would have taken in preference to all others,—and then his apology would have been, that those men had been rendered desperate by the extortions of Mr Scott, and had, in consequence, got themselves to Botany Bay,—and, therefore, he would have said, I cannot bring them here as witnesses.

"It appears to me extraordinary, that, in a case of three years and a half of extortion, and at the end of a year of hard litigation, Mr M'Gavin has only produced four cases, and such a four,—four of the description I have stated.

"Those are the whole cases you have to try in defence of this action.

"I am much disposed, in conclusion, to maintain an argument to you,—that, even if the defender should succeed in giving an air of possibility of some foundation of fact to those cases, his defence would not be very good,—for, admitting there was a foundation in truth for those cases,—admitting that Mr Scott, acting with thousands of low people, persons capable of being corrupted by a rich defender, had been traduced by them—if such were his situation, I would say this would not allow Mr M'Gavin to publish those statements which he did publish.

"But, even were those things proved, that would not justify such a general calumny as that which has been propagated against him by Mr M'Gavin.

"But, every one of them will be disproved, or will not be proved. And, if you do not believe those cases to be proved, can you conceive a more atrocious system of calumny than that by which Mr Scott has been opposed? You will observe, in the first place, that those are all calumnies against a gentleman of the sacred profession,—against a man of that profession, which, by the manners and principles of all sensible and liberal men of modern times, is preserved from calumny, because the injury done to such a character is always the most severely felt. In the next place, the calumnies are not only uttered against a clergyman, but they have this exaggeration, that he is accused of being guilty of those extortions, by the prostitution of those very offices, which it was his duty to administer for the benefit of his congregation. If he had been accused of robbery on the highway, that would not have equalled the charge which was made against him, that he, a minister of religion, withheld the consolations of religion to the dying and to infants.

"I have no fear of your views and feelings. I hold it a serious aggravation of the calumny, that it was against a clergyman of the Catholic persuasion. I need not tell you that the Catholic religion is as much tolerated as the Episcopalian or Presbyterian. It may be right or wrong—all have agreed to treat all other sects with tenderness and deference.

"There is in Scotland a prejudice against Catholics, a prejudice which, I hope, will last as most salutary, and at Glasgow it rages most, because there the lowest description of Catholics abound, and the people notoriously live in a sort of alarm from them. Therefore it was peculiarly patriotic and proper in Mr Scott, to endeavour to reclaim them; not by teaching them, that their pastor was a rogue, despising their chapel and institutions, but teaching them, and recommending to them, 'send your children and go yourselves to our chapel.' It was, therefore, peculiarly absurd for Mr M'Gavin to throw his firebrands into this place, knowing every publication was doing an injury, not merely to Mr Scott and the Catholic religion, but to the peace of the country, which nothing he, or any person could do, could prevent.

"Then observe, if there be any thing in his apology of his desire to resist the errors of Popery. For such resistance, there was no need of publishing his calumnies against Mr Scott as he did. The best resistance is by argument, which men can read calmly and deliberately. But he used first a newspaper, and then a pamphlet at a penny or twopence. The work itself, by Mr M'Gavin, was hung up on the statue of king William, for the sake of being read by the mob in the street; and the effect of all this was, that Mr Scott was, in many cases, made the victim of popular commotion. In the town of Greenock, for instance, there was a dissenter, who, instead of making the Scriptures the subject of his sermon, actually gave his hearers a lecture from the Protestant, insomuch that the Catholic clergyman there, was obliged to apply to the magistrates for assistance. And, after an interval of fourteen months, Mr M'Gavin resumed his calumnies.

"Therefore, I say, I never saw a libel equal in point of seriousness, to that now before you.

"His apologies for his conduct, will best come from himself. You will hear them from his Counsel. But, in case we should not have an opportunity afterwards, I shall advert a little to his defence.

"He says, his statements are true; we say, they are false. Then he says, there was a work, called The Catholic Vindicator, where the cause of Protestantism was attacked; and where he, Mr M'Gavin, was traduced.

"If that matter were to be gone into, which we think it cannot be, as it is not in the Issues, we have the evidence of the Editor, that Mr Scott did not edit it, did not write for it, did not encourage it, had no concern with it.

"The defender says, there was one Murphy preached a sermon hostile to him. If true, that would show he was, in addition to his religious duty, indulging a personal feeling of revenge. But, in the first place, he did not utter a word personally about Mr M'Gavin. In the next place, that does not apply to Mr Scott—he was not there, and knew nothing of it before.

"Then the defender says, (which forms another topic) he was actuated by a warm and most extraordinary love of Protestantism; and it was under the influence of that sacred impulse and feeling, that he has given vent to all this opposition of Mr Scott.

"As to the religious feelings of Mr M'Gavin, I have no reason to question them; but whether pointing out a clergyman to popular fury, is the best way of showing his zeal, I question very much. I believe it is upon this statement of his, he is mainly relying for success, or extenuation, this day. I cannot conceal from you what I think; and therefore I shall say, I believe this defence is maintained on the footing and presumption, that you are a prejudiced Jury,—not that you are so individually—but he knows that a Jury, in this country, must be composed of Protestants, and those alone; and he says, he is vindicating Protestantism against the Catholics; and he relies upon this, that we are not so reduced, that justice cannot be done in this country, even by a respectable well-educated Jury, in such a case. If the parties were exchanged, he would shrink from the case altogether.

"Having explained to you the grounds upon which this action rests, I rely upon your candour and justice, and upon your oaths, that that circumstance to which I have alluded, will make no odds in your verdict.

"I believe the defender intends to attempt to prove, that he was at least guilty of believing and of saying no more than one half of the town of Glasgow believed and said. The stories might be false; but they were generally spoken of, and believed.

"I say, first, the statement is not true, in point of fact.

"What impressions exist now, as to Mr Scott, I appeal to the pamphlet what they must be. It would be very odd, indeed, that, after such writing, Mr Scott's character should be as it was. But, I do not believe the defender will prove that, prior to the date of his publication, there was the least prejudice against Mr Scott. Then the more prejudice there is since against him, the more signal should be your damages.

"You will observe, moreover, I cannot admit, and the law does not admit, that because a man's character is affected by calumnies whispered about the street, people are therefore entitled to publish them, and give them dates and names. Here there are reports every day about characters that are doubtful, and about others that are not at all doubtful; and, as to general rumours, no man of sense cares any thing about them. But that is no excuse for a person going about getting all the stories he can, and raising up a tissue of printed and circulated stories, after which it is scarcely possible for the mind refusing belief to them.

"Therefore, whatever length this plea may go, in extenuation of damages, it is no defence at all: nor is it an extenuation; for no such report existed, till Mr M'Gavin created and gave it force.

"In these circumstances, we are entitled to signal damages from your hands. Every farthing given of the damages asked, could not restore Mr Scott to the respectability and comfort he enjoyed before.

"As to the other defenders, we have nothing to say at all. The Editorship and the Printing are admitted; and although the other defenders may not have been actuated by the motives of Mr M'Gavin, they are also liable in damages. Therefore, your verdict may divide the damages among them as you please; but, in justice and in law, we are entitled to have a verdict against the whole defenders."

EVIDENCE FOR THE PURSUER.

BISHOP CAMERON examined by MR JEFFREY.

Q. You are a Roman Catholic Bishop, I believe?—A. Yes.

Q. Are you the superior and ecclesiastical resident head of that establishment in Scotland?—A. In the Lowlands of Scotland.

Q. Which includes the Diocese of Glasgow?—A. Yes.

Q. Do you know Mr Scott?—A. I do.

Q. He is the officiating clergyman at Glasgow, I understand?—A. He is.

Q. How long has he been there, do you recollect?—A. I do not recollect.

Q. Has he been the sole Roman Catholic clergyman there?—A. The sole.

Q. He has no colleague?—A. None.

Q. You recollect the building of the new chapel in Glasgow?—A. Perfectly well.

Q. Are you aware Mr Scott took an interest in collecting the funds by which it was partly raised?—A. Yes, he did.

Q. There also is a Manse or dwelling for the Priest, for which contributions were made?—A. There is.

Q. Has Mr Scott any fixed or vested right in that living?—A. He is liable to be moved at pleasure—he may be moved from it in a moment.

Q. At the pleasure of his ecclesiastical superior?—A. At the pleasure of his ecclesiastical superior.

Q. Has he any patrimonial interest in the seat rents?—A. He has none whatever.

Q. Has he any pecuniary or patrimonial interest in the property, either of the chapel or dwelling-house?—A. He has none.

Q. He is paid by a fixed salary?—A. He has a fixed salary.

Q. May I ask the amount?—A. I cannot exactly say—it is £50 or £60. It was originally, in his predecessor's time, £30. I thought that little, and I made it then £40. Then I brought it to £50; and I afterwards brought it, I think, to £60. I am sure it is not higher.

Q. Is the number of Catholics great at Glasgow?—A. Those who attend their religious duties are about 2,000. The number of nominal Roman Catholics, I have been told, may amount to 14,000, 15,000, or 18,000. I have heard it carried that length.

Q. Do you consider it a most laborious charge?—A. Yes,—the most laborious which any Roman Catholic clergyman in Scotland has.

Q. Do you know whether Mr Scott felt the labour too great for him, and applied to be removed from the charge?—A. I do not know that he applied for removal, and I am not conscious I have any other person, whom I could put in that place, to perform all the duties of it as he has done.

Q. The dwelling-house is larger than is necessary for the accommodation of a single Priest, I understand?—A. It was built with a view to two at least, because two are absolutely necessary, if they could be supported there.

Q. Does Mr. Scott occupy the whole of that house?—A. He does not.

Q. Was there ever any application made for his being moved to a smaller dwelling?—A. There was, from himself.

Q. And to what purpose then would the house be applied?—A. The rent was to pay the interest of debt contracted, and pay off part of the debt.

Q. The rent was not to be applied by him for his own interest?—A. Not at all.

Q. Had you any duty to perform in auditing the accounts of the chapel?—A. I had a right, which I exercised for some years while the building was going on.

Q. Were you satisfied with the collection and distribution of the funds?—A. I was.

Q. Do the rules or principles of your faith justify refusing the ordinances to those refusing to pay, or contribute, towards the building of the chapel?—A. No. Whatever temporary obligation they had made, could be no reason for refusing any of the Sacraments to any of the congregation.

Q. If a complaint had been made of refusal to baptize, would that have been proceeded upon?—A. I should have considered myself obliged to suspend the clergyman.

Q. Is it generally known among Catholics, that the officiating Priest is liable to be complained upon to his superior?—A. I suppose it is universally known, among even the most ignorant.

Q. Were any complaints ever made to you against Mr Scott?—A. Never.

Q. Never for refusal of baptism?—A. Never.

Q. Are there grounds or reasons for which clergymen are justified or directed to refuse baptism, as in the case of an improper marriage?—A. Mr Scott's predecessor was in the habit of refusing baptism of children of parents who could not show they were married; and, perhaps, that may have been done by others, though I do not know that it has. The common discipline of our church is, that, when baptism is applied for, the father, the head of the family, has it in his power to have the baptism by whom he pleases. If he be absent, or is not a Roman Catholic, then the mother applies. Whether the child is lawful or not, we always baptize the child.

Q. I understand you to say, that in the time of the predecessor of Mr Scott, some delay or hesitation had occurred as to baptism?—A. It certainly did occur. I cannot say I did approve of it.

Q. It came to your knowledge by complaint?—A. Not by complaint. I only heard of his practice, which I did not approve of.

Q. Has there been any such refusal since Mr Scott has been incumbent?—A. I do not recollect of having heard of any.

Q. Have such as Mr Scott the power of allowing the chapel to be used to be preached in?—A. He cannot to any person not of the body of the Scotch Roman Catholic clergy. He cannot to any from France, England, or any other country than Scotland.

Q. Do you remember a person of the name of Murphy that preached there?—A. He had my authority to preach, not only there, but in any other chapel in this country. I was acquainted with him in Spain. He considered himself under obligations to me. He came to Scotland to visit me, and I gave him power to preach in Scotland.

Q. And after that permission, Mr Scott could not have refused him leave to preach in the chapel at Glasgow?—A. I do not conceive he could.

Q. You were not at Glasgow at the time he preached there?—A. No, I was not there at the time.

Q. Had you occasion to know something of a Catholic publication, called The Vindicator?—A. Yes, I remember of it, and seeing some numbers of it.

Q. Was that work approved of by the most respectable part of the Catholics in Scotland?—A. No,—nor has any work ever come from that author that has been approved of.

Q. I understand you did not approve of the principles and tone of that work?—A. Of nothing from that man. He has been the author of a periodical paper, which, I believe, no Roman Catholic clergyman in Scotland has subscribed for,—and of the four Vicars Apostolic in England, there is only one who took in any one of his papers, or subscribed for them. That is, Dr Milner.

Q. Do you happen to know whether Mr Scott approved of the Vindicator?—A. I am convinced he did not approve of it. I was against it, and against the controversy.

Q. Do you know he ever contributed to it?—A. I do not suppose he ever did.

Q. You have no reason to suppose he ever did?—A. No; on the contrary, I should think he did not.

Q. Do you know that there is a regular baptism-register kept in such a charge at Glasgow?—A. There ought to be.

Q. Such register is kept by your directions?—A. Yes.

Q. It is part of your duty to see it is complied with?—A. It is my duty.

Q. Is that the form in which such registers are kept? (A book was handed to the witness.)—A. This is the book, and this is the common form of the register. I see two certificates entered by myself.

Q. And it has the appearance of a regular register book of baptisms?—A. I know it is one. I know the handwriting of Mr Scott and my own.

Q. Is it his duty to keep the book?—A. It is his duty.

Q. And you observe some entries in your own handwriting, which you put in when you baptized children?—A. I must have done so. I do not recollect the circumstances at this time.

Q. Are you aware it is the practice to keep lists of the communicants at Easter?—A. It is.

Q. There is more solemnity in your church attached to that festival than to any other in the course of the year?—A. There is.

Q. And upon that occasion, it is the list that shows the persons that were in communion?—A. It is.

Q. Is it a part of the duty of the clergyman to keep those lists in his own hands?—A. No, I do not conceive it is. The list is only for himself, to know which of his people are attending to their duty. It is not part of his duty to submit it to his superior.

Q. Is it consistent with your knowledge, that the former chapel was a great deal too small?—A. It was a great deal too small. The present is small enough, and perhaps too small.

Cross-examined by Mr MONCREIFF.

Q. You said, in regard to the accounts for the erection of this chapel, that you had a right to control the accounts, and did so for some period?—A. I did, for several years, see them.

Q. They were sent you?—A. No;—I inspected them there, and put my name to them.

Q. What kind of accounts were they?—A. I do not understand the question.

Q. Was there a book of accounts?—A. There was.

Q. Did you put your name to that book?—A. I did, for some years.

Q. Did you put your name more than once?—A. I must have put my name two or three different years, or perhaps oftener. I do not recollect particularly.

Q. In this book, was an account kept of disbursements and receipts?—A. It was not kept in a commercial way. It showed what was spent, and what was got in, and how it was got in,—what was borrowed, &c.

Q. Did it appear, from the book, at what time the sums were received and given out?—A. It must have appeared when they were given out. They did not come in regularly. When there was not money, there was a necessity to borrow.

Q. What like a book was that in appearance?—A. I cannot answer that question. I do not recollect at all. It is some years since I was there; and, from age and infirmity, I cannot rely upon my memory so much as to describe it to you.

Q. When you put your name to this book, did you put any docket upon it; did you write any thing?—A. I must certainly have done that; I must have given a declaration that I had examined the accounts, and that I approved of them. I do not recollect in what form this was done; but I must have done it.

Q. In whose possession was this book at the time you went over it?—A. In Mr Scott's.

Q. You mentioned, you knew Mr Murphy, and gave him authority to preach?—A. I did.

Q. Did you mean, he might have gone and insisted on leave to preach?—A. Very far from it.

Q. I suppose you meant, if Mr Scott asked him, he was in safety to do it?—A. That is what I mean.

Q. Do you remember what year it was when you last inspected that book?—A. I have no recollection of that whatever.

Q. Was the chapel finished by that time?—A. I think not; but I cannot say any thing upon that subject, as I do not recollect the particular time.

Q. You mentioned, when the baptism-register was shown you, you saw certificates written by yourself; did you observe what time that was?—A. When the book was in my hand, I believe, I observed; but I cannot repeat it now. (The book was again handed to the witness.) July 4th, and July 5th, 1813.

Mr JEFFREY—"I do not know that it is quite correct in my learned friend to examine as to the contents of the book. I conceive, he is not entitled to make a witness speak from memory to a written record."

Mr MONCREIFF—Q. Did the book contain the list of the whole of the private contributors, or only some of them?—A. Not any of them. I think I saw lists of them also, but on separate sheets.

Q. Did the books you mention contain an account of the progress of the seat rents?—A. I had a right to ask about them. I did—and I was informed of them,—but I do not recollect the amount.

(A list of private contributors having been handed to the witness.) Q. Is that the kind of separate papers you mentioned?—A. Yes.

Q. You saw no list of those who did not subscribe?—A. No, I did not.

Q. You have seen The Protestant?—A. I have, occasionally.

Q. You are aware of the particular passages, or most of them, which have given occasion to the present action?—A. I could not, upon oath, or any way, say positively as to them.

Q. I ask, whether the observations there, as to the conduct of those collecting the money, were understood by you as applying to Mr Scott?

LORD CHIEF COMMISSIONER—"When you read that paper, whom did you consider the observations applied to?"—A. I considered that paper a personal attack on Mr Scott

Mr MONCREIFF—Q. Do you mean to say, you understood the whole of that Protestant an attack on Mr Scott?—A. I have seen very little of it. Those are works I find very little amusement or instruction from.

LORD GILLIES—"Bishop Cameron, your examination being concluded, if you wish to remain in Court, take this seat on the Bench."

(Bishop Cameron took a seat on the Bench accordingly.)

Mr COCKBURN—"We called Bishop Cameron, as soon as I opened the case, not to detain him waiting in the witnesses' room.

"The copy of the work is admitted and given in, and we give in the defences and the libels. We also give in the Chronicle and papers where the controversy took place.

"We have given in the Chronicle—we now give in the letter written by Mr Scott to Mr Prentice, dated 31st July, 1818, requiring to know the name of the author. We give in Mr Prentice's answer.

"We give in the letter from the pursuer to the defender, requiring to know if he was the person alluded to in the paragraph quoted from the Chronicle.

"Then the defender's answer, 1st Aug. 1818. Another letter from the pursuer to the defender, dated Aug. 3d, requiring a direct answer to his query, with his answer.

"We gave in a copy of The Protestant, as originally published; but I now give in another edition, of a similar form, 3d edition of that work, No. 15 of Process.

"I give in the answers to the condescendence. There was one passage I read, and there is an article here, No. 9, I wish to read. 'The defender, upon inquiry, has discovered that there is a mistake in the statement of a child having died who was refused baptism. He believes that, in the case referred to, the child did not die, though, in that case, the child was very unwell, and apparently dying, which occasioned that mistake; and, so far as this circumstance may affect either the cause or the controversy in general, he acknowledges the fact.'"

JAMES O'CONNAR examined by Mr COCKBURN.

Q. What are you?—A. A cloth-lapper, in Glasgow.

Q. Are you a member of Mr Scott's congregation ?—A. Yes.

Q. Were you one of the members appointed to collect contributions to the new chapel ?—A. Yes.

Q. You have attended chapel regularly for some years ?—A. Yes.

Q. When that chapel was set a-going, was there a division of the congregation into districts for the collection of the contributions ?—A. Yes.

Q. Were there books as to the contributions ?—A. Yes.

Q. What kind of books ?—A. They were small books.

Q. Was this the kind of thing ? (A book was handed to the witness)—A. Yes,—they were of that size.

Q. Look inside.—A. This was the kind of books.

Q. Had you any instructions from Mr Scott how to proceed ?—A. Yes,—to take the names of those residing in the districts professing the Catholic religion, and to inquire what they would contribute for the purpose of building the chapel. He told me not to call on any person where there was sickness, and not to take from those who were low in circumstances.

Q. Was there intimation of this kind given to the congregation at large ?—A. It was in his house.

Q. But was there to the public ?—A. None, as to sickness. It was in consequence of my mentioning to Mr Scott, that there was a person sick in my district, that he gave me the instructions I have mentioned.

Q. And you also got instructions not to take from those who were poor at the time ?—A. Yes.

Q. Was that instruction given from the pulpit ?—A. I do not recollect. I never exacted;—sometimes they gave me, and on a Sunday.

Q. Was it, as far as you know, a voluntary contribution ?—A. Yes.

Q. Did Mr Scott ever threaten the refusal of ordinances ?—A. Never.

Q. It is Mr Scott's duty to visit the sick ?—A. Yes.

Q. Did he decline that duty, except to those who subscribed to the chapel ?—A. No.

Q. Do you know instances of his visiting those who did not subscribe ?—A. To my knowledge, he visited those who did not subscribe, and those who were in arrear in payment of their contributions.

Q. And he came freely to them ?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you ever receive instructions from Mr Scott to ask masters to retain the wages of men, in order to get their subscriptions ?—A. Never.

Q. Did you ever know that done ?—A. I never did.

Q. Did you ever hear Mr Scott request persons to get their children baptized, without reference to their subscriptions ?—A. Yes,—both in public and privately.

Q. Did you ever hear of a work called The Protestant, that was published in Glasgow ?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you ever read it ?—A. A good deal of it at first. I purchased about thirty-seven numbers of it, and I afterwards got a reading of it from others.

Q. Did you apply it to Mr Scott ?—A. He was mentioned by name in some numbers, and alluded to in others. I considered the allusions were to him.

(A book of lists were shown to the witness.)

Q. Is that one of the lists ?—A. There have been collections entered there. I think it is.

Q. I observe all this crossed down here—do you know what this denotes ?—A. Some persons called once a fortnight, sometimes once a month, once a week, &c. Those columns denote different portions of time.

Q. What was the general time ? — A. I called once a fortnight.

Q. Was that the general time ?—A. I believe it was the most general time.

Q. Suppose there had been an arrear for a fortnight ?—A. I put in a figure for the sum I received. (Witness gave explanation as to the book.)

(Book handed to the Bench.)

Cross-examined by Mr. MONCREIFF.

Q. How many collectors were there ?—A. I do not know.

Q. Can you say nearly what number there was ?—A. There was a great many in the town and suburbs.

Q. Nearly how many ?—A. I should suppose more than twenty.

Q. Was there fifty ?—A. I cannot say whether there was or not. I cannot swear how many.

Q. You have said, that you have known Mr Scott visit the sick, and families where subscriptions had not been given, and families where arrears had not been paid up ?—A. I have known Mr Scott to visit in both cases.

Q. Do you mean in your own district ?—A. In my own district.

Q. You have heard Mr Scott recommend baptism in the chapel;—how long since it was built ?—A. Both before and after. I have been there eight or ten years. I have heard him frequently exhort the people to come forward and get their children baptized.

Q. Did you ever, upon any occasion, hear him state persons to be in arrear, from the pulpit ?—A. No,—I never did.

Q. Are you sure ?—A. Not for their being in arrear only,—it was for other actions. I have heard him mention names of persons who had given scandal. I have heard him mention persons who were spending their money and drinking it foolishly, and say, those not paying to the chapel were those who were giving scandal.

Q. When was it you heard him say this?—A. In the course of the collection;—it was begun in 1813, and finished in 1816.

Q. Did he mention particular names?—A. I do not recollect the exact names.

Q. When he mentioned names of persons, did he allude to them only, or others?—A. He made no allusion to others.

Q. When you gave in the books, did he mark the money paid?—A. I read over the names and the money received, and he marked them for himself. I retained the book.

Q. Did he give you any acknowledgment for the money you had given in?—A. He did not. I marked the date in my book of receiving the money.

Q. Would you know it if you saw it?—A. I have my book here. I never gave it in.

Q. You had that book, and marked the dates of collecting. Tell us the times of making the collection from that book?—A. If you allow me to look at the book.

Lord Chief Commissioner—Q. That is not a book written since?—A. I carried it with me when I collected the money.

Mr Moncreiff—Q. Tell us as to the period. The place I am looking at just now, runs from the 9th of March, (carried forward from another part,) 1816?—A. That is the list—30th Nov. same year, was that I collected.

Q. Did you not collect any more after that?—A. Never for the chapel.

Q For any thing?—A. Yes,—a few shillings for the building of the house. I do not recollect so well as to that. I did not get much. I collected something in the summer of last year, I believe, to pay up the arrears of debt,—whether for the house or chapel I do not know. The only sum was two shillings last year.

Q. Were the other collectors going on at the same time?—A. I was told they were, in the summer, when the work people would be employed,—the month of June.

Q. Had you books before that?—A. I had similar to this one. I brought money forward in this one.

Q. Have you that other one with you?—A. I have a sheet which contains the names and the sums. There is nothing in the book—there is not a name in it. This is all that was in it,—that was torn out. I had taken the two last leaves out of the book, which lessened this. There is no other writing in the book than that which I have.

Mr Jeffrey—Q. You began at 1813?—A. Yes.

Mr Moncreiff—Q. Will you be so good as put in those books and papers?

(They were given to the Clerk of Court.)

Lord Chief Commissioner—"You asked the witness as to The Protestant, but without referring to the particular passages upon which you found. You ought to prove that the witnesses understand that the passages referred to, were meant to be applied to the pursuer."

Mr Cockburn—Q. There is no other Roman Catholic clergyman in Glasgow?—A. None that take charge of the congregation.

Q. Is there any other of the name of Scott?—A. None.

Q. You took in the first thirty-six numbers of The Protestant?—A. Yes.

Q. And you said there were certain passages of it that applied to Mr Scott?—A. Yes.

Q. Injuriously, and against Mr Scott?—A. Yes.

Q. There are a parcel of passages there—look at them.

(The Issues were handed to the witness.)

Lord Chief Commissioner—"From the practice of keeping witnesses out of Court, there is some disadvantage. The first and whole gist of the matter is, that what is charged as libel, must, in the understanding of mankind, known to the person libelled, be held as meant of that person. The witnesses, therefore, as they come up, having heard the libel, and being asked, whom they understand it referred to; they say it did, or did not, refer to the person in question; and that evidence goes to the Jury. Now, as the witnesses are not here, some method must be taken, to put before them that as to which they are to be asked questions."

Witness—"I have looked at two passages, in which Mr Scott's name is not mentioned; but I think that it is Mr Scott that is meant and referred to. 'Now it is a fact, that, while the chapel was a-building, the people, while they yet met in their old place of worship, were assured by their ghostly father,'—(the following is at the bottom of the page: 'This phrase is not used as a term of reproach. Ghostly is the old English word for spiritual; and, according to the Douay Catechism, ghostly father is the title by which the clergy choose to be called,')—'that such of them as fell behind in their payments, should not enjoy church privileges. What was this, but extorting money through the fear of future punishment? And from the condition of many of those from whom it was so extorted, who can doubt that they had often scarcely food for their families, or clothes to cover them? Every one knows in what estimation Papists regard the privileges of their church. To be denied these, is the same as to be denied the salvation of their souls. The poor, therefore, were told, in language sufficiently plain, that, if the chapel tax was not punctually paid, they should suffer the pains of purgatory, or even hell itself.'

"I think Mr Scott was alluded to as the ghostly father in that passage.

"And the other passage is—"'A man, who now lives out of the city, was assessed in a weekly sum for building the chapel. During the dull trade, he fell back with regard to his payments. His family, however, continued to increase; and when he went to his ghostly father, to get a child baptized, he was asked, How he stood with regard to his payments? He confessed, what he could not deny, that, during the hard times, he had fallen behind. He was ordered to go about his business; and told that his child should not be baptized, till he had paid every farthing that he was due. Before he was able to raise the necessary sum, the child died; and the father was left to suffer all the misery, which such a circumstance would occasion to one, who considered baptism necessary to the salvation of his child.'

"I understand those passages to apply to Mr Scott.

Mr MONCREIFF—"Look at the passages on the first page of the Issues, beginning, 'But this is not all. I ask A. V. if that house (meaning the new Catholic chapel) was not built, in a great measure, at the expense of a poor, and, in some instances, a starving people?' Suppose you saw that passage, and no other, would you understand that to apply to Mr Scott?"

Mr JEFFREY—"Is Mr Scott there accused of extortion—'I ask him if money was not extorted, by the fear of future punishment, for the purpose of building that house, from persons who had scarcely bread for their families, or clothes to cover them? And is this what he calls the piety and public spirit of the Catholics of Glasgow?'"

WITNESS—"I consider the passage as applying to Mr Scott. It goes on: 'The Almighty hates robbery for burnt-offering; and will he accept, as honourable to him, that which has been wrung from the sweat, and sinews, and blood of his own miserable creatures? Let the means by which this house was reared, be inscribed upon its front, and it will remain for "ages to come" a monument of Popish hard-heartedness and cruelty.' That I consider as applying to Mr Scott. I know no other person it could apply to, but him, if there was wrong.

"May I now go? I have instructions from my employers, to return as soon as the examination should be over."

JAMES BOWMAN examined by MR JEFFREY.

Q. You belong to the congregation of Catholics in Glasgow?—A. Yes.

Q. How long have you belonged to that congregation?—A. Upwards of twenty years.

Q. Do you remember the old chapel?—A. Yes.

Q. Was it large enough to hold the congregation?—A. By no means.

Q. Do you remember the new chapel a-building?—A. Yes.

Q. Was part of the funds raised by contributions from the people?—A. Yes.

Q. Were there collectors of the contributions appointed?—A. Yes.

Q. Were you one?—A. Yes; but I did not collect long.

Q. Was the scheme of collecting, in that way, announced by Mr Scott, or any body, to the congregation at large?—A. It was, by Mr Scott.

Q. He told of the scheme of collectors?—A. Yes.

Q. Were instructions given to those collectors?—A. Yes.

Q. Do you remember the nature of them?—A. To see what Catholics were in the districts, and call upon them for what they might be pleased to give.

Q. Was there any thing said about the class of persons from whom the contributions should be taken, or from whom they should not be asked?—A. I do not recollect.

Q. Any thing about the sick?—A. I never understood persons in distress of any kind were to give any thing

Q. Was any thing said by Mr Scott about that?—A. I remember getting that instruction from himself.

Q. Did you ever hear Mr Scott say, or was it any part of his instructions to you, that persons should not be admitted to church privileges who would not contribute?—A. Never.

Q. Do you know, whether in point of fact, those who did not contribute, were admitted to church privileges?—A. I know perfectly well many, who did not contribute, who got church privileges.

Q. And the same was the case as to those who subscribed, and failed to pay?—A. So far as I know.

Q. Are you a regular attender of church?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you ever hear Mr Scott threaten or denounce any consequences, spiritual or temporal, upon those who would not subscribe?—A. Never.

Q. There were no threats?—A. No threats.

Q. In so far as you were instructed, or carried through the subscription, was it compulsory, or voluntary?—A. I neither had instructions to compel any one, nor did compel any one.

Q. Do you recollect when the chapel was finished?—A. In December, 1816.

Q. And then the seats were let?—A. Not till February after.

Q. Did those who subscribed the most, get a preference in choosing seats?—A. Yes; if they were present.

Q. Were any seats reserved for those who did not contribute at all?—A. Yes; a hundred.

Q. To ascertain those who did contribute in 1816, was any summation or abstract made of the amount of such subscriptions?—A. I was employed to do that myself.

Q. Mr Scott superintended?—A. Yes.

Q. Was that done with a view to give a preference as to the seats?—A. Yes.

Q. What were the classes?—A. Those who subscribed ten pounds and upwards, were in one class. Another class of subscribers, was of those who gave from ten to seven pounds. Then there was a class of those from seven to five pounds;—then from five to four pounds;—from four to three pounds;—from three to two pounds;—from two to one pound;—from one pound to ten shillings;—from ten shillings to five shillings. None were entitled to preferences who subscribed under five shillings.

(Books were handed to the witness.)

WITNESS—My summing up is here.

Q. You summed up at the end of each of those articles?—A. I did.

Q. When those abstracts were made from these summings up of yours, were they exhibited, or left to be examined?—A. They were all open during the letting of the seats.

Q. Where?—A. They were lying in the middle of the chapel.

Q. Was notice given that they were there?—A. Eight or twelve days before.

Q. And of course any body might inspect them?—A. Yes. Some weeks were allowed to give a chance to those who had ever given any thing to the building of the old chapel; as what was given to the old chapel was taken to account.

Q. And the benefit that was given was, that they were to be preferred in the getting of seats?—A. Yes.

Q. And the seats were at last let upon that principle?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you ever hear any complaint of persons not having enough put down for them, and not getting their seats?—A. Never upon that ground. The calling of the names took longer than was expected; many were passed over; they complained for three years and a half.

Q. That many got before them for being present?—A. Yes.

Q. You were employed to sum up, and make the abstracts,—did you attend during the whole of the letting of the seats?—A. Yes.

Q. And you have heard no one complain of being stated short of what he subscribed?—A. I never heard one complain of it.

Q. You were lately required to look at the abstracts you had made; and were required to arrange them in other abstracts?—A. I was.

(After looking over some productions presented to him.)

WITNESS—This is my hand—This is another in my hand—This is a third in my hand.

Q. Those you made from the same books in which you saw your own summations?—A. Yes.

Q. And those are correct abstracts?—A. Yes.

Q. You did your best to make them so?—A. I did; and I believe them to be correct.

Mr JEFFREY—By far the largest class of subscribers is that of those who, in the three years, paid no more than five shillings?

WITNESS—We did not give a preference to any subscribers under five shillings.

Mr JEFFREY—Q. One of those is an abstract, entitled, "Note from the Baptismal Register," by which it appears 108 had been baptized in one year, some of whose parents had paid for the chapel, and others had not. You made that by comparing the Abstract Lists with the Baptismal Register?—A. I did. I think I counted fifty-nine one year, that had children baptized, that had never paid a farthing.

Mr JEFFREY—Difference between 59 and 108, 49 in all.

I wish to lay before the jury the tenor of one of those Abstracts. This is the general Abstract of sums collected from the commencement down till March, 1817.

£10 and upwards	27
£10 to £7	45
£7 to £5	61
£5 to £4	168
£4 to £3	248
£3 to £2	401
£2 to £1	749
£1 to 10s.	692
10s. to 5s.	597
Under 5s.	1049
Number of contributors,	4037*
Those who have contributed nothing,	480
Total number in the books,	4517

Which comes down to from ten pounds to one pound;—from one pound to ten shillings;—from ten shillings to five shillings. The number of those who subscribed under five shillings, was a thousand and forty-nine persons. The total number of subscribers was four thousand and thirty-seven. But there were persons who had contributed nothing. The

* From another production it appears, that the sum contributed by these 4037 persons, during the time specified, was £5487 9s. 9d.; which, together with £426 3s. makes the sum of £5913, (throwing out the shillings,) mentioned by Mr Cockburn, in page 17, near the bottom. The £426 3s. is upon a separate list. It is the amount of what was subscribed in large sums, partly, or chiefly by Protestants, including Mr Finlay's 50 guineas. The other sum of £5487 9s. 9d. was raised in small sums, according to the above scale, from under five shillings and upward. There seems to be some confusion in reporting the conclusion of the last paragraph in page 17. It is supposed, it should be read thus: "So there remains, as subscribed by all the Catholics in the West of Scotland, £5487, and £426, subscribed chiefly by Protestants." This explanation seems necessary to make the passage intelligible.

defaulters must have been extremely numerous in the three years and a half. There is also an Abstract of those who have contributed to the Roman Catholic Establishment in Glasgow, since the opening of the new chapel, to December, 1820, under their respective sums; and likewise of those who are in the lists, but have contributed nothing during that period. Extracted from the Collection Books.

20s. and upwards,	95
20s. to 15s.	49
15s. to 10s.	319
10s. to 5s.	608
Under 5s.	1625
	2696*
Those who have paid nothing,	1261
Total,	3957

Q. You have seen a publication called The Protestant?—A. I did read it regularly for twelve months.

Q. There is a paper I hand to you, that contains certain quotations from it. Look at that passage, said to have been inserted in the Glasgow Chronicle, and reprinted in The Protestant. I ask, whom did you understand to be the person accused of robbery and extortion in that passage?—A. I understood the Rev. Andrew Scott.

Q. There are various other passages, mentioning "ghostly father;" whom did you understand by that?—A. Mr Scott.

Q. Was there any Catholic clergyman in Glasgow, but Mr Scott?—A. None resident there.

Cross-examined by Mr MONCREIFF.

Q. Were you twelve months a collector?—A. It might be a little more, or a little less.

Q. What year was it?—A. At the commencement.

Q. You were not a collector in the year 1816?—A. I was not.

Q. How did you come to be employed to compare the list of baptisms with the list of contributors?—A. I was told that it might be of use, in case of any prosecution.

Q. When was it?—A. Within twelve months last past.

Q. Who desired you to do it?—A. Mr Scott.

Q. It was at the beginning of the collection you were employed as a collector; when was it?—A. 1813.

Q. How did you come to give up your collection?—A. My business called me from town.

Q. Where were you?—A. About four miles from Glasgow.

Q. Did you not resume the business of collecting, when you came back?—A. I did not.

Q. Then you do not know personally what was done in the collection after that?—A. I do not.

Q. Did you ever see a pamphlet, called The Catholic Vindicator?—A. I have.

Q. Had you any concern with it yourself?—A. None.

Q. Were you a member of a committee of management?—A. I was a member towards the end of it. I signed a paper to bear part of the expense if any loss was incurred.

Q. When was that?—A. Just before it was given up entirely.

Q. Did you get that paper regularly?—A. I did.

Q. Did you find any thing in it reflecting on Mr M'Gavin?—A. O! very much.

Q. You know there was a committee in Glasgow managed that paper?—A. O! yes; I believe there was.

Q. Did you know any of the members?—A. Yes, I knew several.

Q. Were they members of Mr Scott's congregation?—A. Yes.

Q. Have they any office in the congregation?—A. No office there.

Q. Were they elders or deacons?—A. There are none in the Catholic Church, that I know of.

Q. Were any of them collectors?—A. They might be—I do not know whether they were or not—I dare say they were.

Q. Did you ever see any placard put up about Mr M'Gavin?—A. Yes, I have seen hand-bills announcing The Catholic Vindicator.

Q. Did they mention Mr M'Gavin?—A. I do not think it named him.

Q. Did it mention The Protestant?—A. It certainly mentioned The Protestant; there is no doubt of that.

Q. When you made your collection, did you give in the money to Mr Scott?—A. Yes.

Q. Did he mark it in a book?—A. He did.

Q. How often did you give it in?—A. Once a fortnight.

Q. Was any note made of the times you gave it in?—A. Every one was marked in the proper column.

Q. Was there a date of year and month?—A. I do not recollect the date. Some of them were numbered.

Q. Did you get any acknowledgment of the sum?—A. No acknowledgment, but causing it to be marked in his book.

Q. Have you that book?—A. I have not;—the person after me got that book.

Q. Did you ever see a placard like that?

(A placard was shown to the witness.)

LORD CHIEF COMMISSIONER—"How do you mean to apply it?"

Mr MONCREIFF—"There are different ways

* It appears by another production, that the total sum subscribed by these 2696 persons, from March, 1817, to December, 1820, was only £687 18s. 3d.; making the total amount of subscriptions, down to the end of 1820, only £663l. 11s.

of applying it. I am cross-examining their witness."

LORD CHIEF COMMISSIONER—"Very well."

WITNESS—"I have seen something like that."

Mr MONCREIFF—Q. Do you see "The Protestant, a defender of adultery?"—A. I do.

Q. About what time was The Vindicator given up?—A. I do not recollect. After it had continued about twelve months.

Q. When did you subscribe?—A. It might be a little before it ceased.

Q. Can you give the names of the members of that Committee that you know?—A. I never was at any of their meetings. I only knew them by report.

Q. Did they ever tell you themselves they were members of the Committee?—A. I dare say they did.

Q. Who did so?—A. A brother of mine.

Q. What is his name?—A. A—— Bowman.

Q. Do you remember any more?—A. I do not recollect any more.

LORD CHIEF COMMISSIONER—Q. It appears, from your evidence, there were fifty-nine who had children baptized, who had never paid any thing to the chapel?—A. Yes.

Q. And that there were forty-nine persons who had paid?—A. Yes.

Q. Had you access to know, that at the time of the baptisms, Mr Scott knew part were subscribers and part not?—A. I have no doubt he knew.

Q. How?—A. He was personally known to most of his people.

Mr COCKBURN—"There was a declaration taken in London, from the editor and publisher of The Vindicator, William Eusebius Andrews, which I wish read."

(One of the Clerks of Court read the Commission, and another the Report. The Commission and Report are here given in the order in which they were read.)

"George the Fourth, by the grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith, to James Chalmers, Esquire, of the city of Westminster, Solicitor, whom failing by absence or otherwise, to Charles Berry, Esquire, of the said city, Solicitor, greeting: Know ye, that we, in confidence of your prudence and fidelity, have appointed you, and by these presents do give unto you severally, full power and authority to examine William Eusebius Andrews, Printer in London, a witness, to be adduced for the pursuer in the Issues directed in the cause in which the Reverend Andrew Scott, Roman Catholic Clergyman in Glasgow, is pursuer, and William M'Gavin, merchant in Glasgow, William Sym, Clerk in the Glasgow Town's Hospital, and Andrew and James Duncan, Printers in Glasgow, are Defenders, to be tried before our Lords Commissioners of the Jury Court in civil causes, in that part of Great Britain called Scotland, pursuant to an Act of Parliament, passed in the fifty-fifth year of the reign of His late Majesty, entituled, 'An Act to facilitate the administration of justice in Scotland, by extending trial by Jury to civil causes;' and of another Act, passed in the fifty-ninth year of His late Majesty, entituled, 'An Act to amend an Act, passed in the fifty-fifth year of His present Majesty, entituled, An Act to facilitate the administration of justice in that part of the United Kingdom called Scotland, by extending trial by Jury to civil causes.' And therefore we command you, the said James Chalmers, Esquire, and you, the said Charles Berry, Esquire, in the event foresaid, That, on or before the twentieth day of June instant, at a certain day and place, to be appointed by you, or such of you as may act in virtue hereof for that purpose, you, or either of you, cause the said witness to come before you, and then and there examine him, upon the interrogatories settled and attached to this commission, on his oath, to be taken before you, according to the form of the oath first indorsed hereupon, and that you reduce such his examination to writing, on paper or parchment; and when so taken, send the same, without delay, to the Lords Commissioners of our Jury Court at Edinburgh, closed up under your seal, together with the said interrogatories, and this writ to be deposited with one of the Clerks of the said Jury Court, in the Register House, Edinburgh. And we further command you, and either of you, who may propose to act in pursuance hereof, that before you act in, or be present at the swearing or examining said witness, you take the second oath hereupon indorsed. And we farther command, that all and every the Clerk or Clerks employed in taking writing, transcribing, or engrossing the deposition, or depositions, of said witness, shall, before he or they be permitted to act as such Clerk or Clerks as aforesaid, severally take the third oath hereupon indorsed. And we also give you full power and authority to administer such oath to such Clerk or Clerks.

"Given under the Seal of our Jury Court, for the Trial of Civil Causes, at Edinburgh, the eighth day of June, in the second year of our reign, 1821.

(Signed) J. OSBURN BROWN.
2d Clerk of the Jury Court."

First oath to be administered to the witness.

You swear by God, and as you shall answer to God, at the great day of judgment, that you will true answer make to all such questions as shall be asked you; and that the evidence which you shall give, shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.

N. B. This oath to be adapted to the religious persuasions of the respective parties taking the same.

Second oath, by the Commissioner, to be taken before the Chief Magistrate of the place where the Commission is opened.

You swear by God, and as you shall answer to God, at the great day of judgment, that you will, according to the best of your skill and knowledge, truly and faithfully, and without partiality to any or either of the parties in this cause, take the examination and deposition of William Eusebius Andrews, the witness to be produced and examined by virtue of the Commission within written, upon the interrogatories attached thereto, or other questions arising therefrom. (Signed) J. O. B.

Third oath, by the Clerk or Clerks appointed to take down the evidence, to be taken before the Commissioner.

You swear by God, and as you shall answer to God, at the great day of judgment, that you will truly and faithfully, and without partiality to any or either of the parties in this cause, take and write down, transcribe, and engross the depositions of all and every witness and witnesses produced before and examined by the Commissioners, or any of them named in the Commission within written, as far forth as you are directed and employed by the said Commissioners, or any of them, to take down, write, or engross the said depositions.

(Signed) J. O. B.

The following is the oath taken by Mr Chalmers.

At Westminster, the fifteenth day of June, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twenty-one. In presence of Edward Markland, Esquire, acting Magistrate of the Police Office, in Queen Square, Westminster, appeared James Chalmers, of Abington Street, Westminster, the person hereby named, Commissioner by the Jury Court in Scotland, and made oath in the form prescribed, by the terms of this Commission, page sixth.

(Signed) JAS. CHALMERS.

Sworn before me, at the Public Office, Queen Square, Westminster, this 15th day of June, 1821.

(Signed) ED. MARKLAND, J. P.

The following is the introduction to the Report, in return to the above-mentioned writ or Commission.

At London, the eighteenth day of June, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twenty-one—

In prosecution of his Majesty's writ, bearing date the eighth day of the present month and year, addressed to James Chalmers, Esquire, of the city of Westminster, Solicitor, giving authority to him to examine William Eusebius Andrews, printer in London, a witness adduced for the pursuer in the Issues directed in the cause, in which the Reverend Andrew Scott is pursuer, and William M'Gavin, and others, are defenders, the said James Chalmers, having previously made oath, as directed by the writ or commission, made choice of George Alexander Mazzoni, his Clerk, to take and write the deposition of the witness, and administered to him the oath prescribed by the writ; and, being attended by David Robertson, of Sackville Street, Solicitor for the pursuer, and John Richardson, of Fludyer Street, Solicitor for the defender and also by the witness, William Eusebius Andrews, who swore the oath directed by the writ to be administered to him, in the precise terms thereof, the said James Chalmers did proceed to the examination of the witness, and caused his answers to the several interrogatories to be taken down as followeth.

Signed) JAS. CHALMERS, Comr.
GEORGE A. MAZZONI, Clerk.

One of the Clerks of Court then read the interrogatories singly, and another of the Clerks of Court the answer to each of the interrogatories, as it was read, as follows:

Interrogatories to be administered to William Eusebius Andrews, printer in London, a witness to be produced, sworn, and examined on the part and behalf of the Reverend Andrew Scott, Roman Catholic clergyman in Glasgow, pursuer, in a certain cause now depending in the Jury Court, at Edinburgh, against William M'Gavin, merchant in Glasgow, William Sym, Clerk in the Glasgow Town's Hospital, and A. and J. Duncan, printers in Glasgow, defenders, before of the same Court, pursuant to an order of the same Court, made on the 23d day of May, 1821, in the second year of the reign of King George the Fourth.

In primis. Do you know the parties, pursuer and defenders, in the title of these interrogatories named, or either, and which of them; and how long have you known them, or either, and which of them? Declare the truth and your knowledge therein.

Appeared William Eusebius Andrews, printer in London, a witness adduced for the pursuer, on the cause mentioned in the Commission, who, being solemnly sworn, purged of malice and partial counsel, examined upon the interrogatories pressed in the Commission.

1st. In answer to the first interrogatory, depones, That he recollects to have seen the pursuer, Mr Scott, twice, but cannot recollect how long ago. That he does not know any of the defenders: depones, That he has written against one of the defenders, M'Gavin, and that he is not personally acquainted with the pursuer, farther than as above deponed to.

2*do.* Was the witness the author, printer, and publisher of a periodical work called The Catholic Vindicator?

2d. To the second interrogatory, depones and answers in the affirmative.

3*tio.* Did the witness subscribe his name and address to each of the numbers of this work, while it continued to be published, and write the text in the first person?

3d. To the third interrogatory, depones and answers, That he did subscribe his name to each of the numbers, and wrote the text in the first person, but that his address was printed in terms of the Act of Parliament as the printer.

4*to*. Where was this work printed, and when was it commenced, and when was it discontinued?

4th. To the fourth interrogatory, depones and answers, That the said work was printed in London: That the work was commenced on the fifth day of December, in the year one thousand eight hundred and eighteen, and it was discontinued on the fourth day of December in the following year.

5*to*. Was the witness resident in London, and did he compose his said periodical work there, during the time it continued to be published?

5th. To the fifth interrogatory, answers and depones in the affirmative.

6*to*. Did the witness, at any time, receive any paragraph or communication to be printed and published in The Catholic Vindicator, from the Rev. Andrew Scott, pursuer in this cause, or of which he understood Mr Scott to be the author,—or had the witness any correspondence with Mr Scott in reference to its publication or circulation?

6th. To the sixth interrogatory, and every part thereof, depones and answers in the negative.

7*mo*. Had the witness an opportunity of knowing from his booksellers, or those who attended to the circulation and sale of The Catholic Vindicator, — that this periodical work was encouraged by the pursuer; or did he, on the contrary, understand that the pursuer had discouraged it?

7th. To the seventh interrogatory, answers and depones, That he has heard from persons concerned in the circulation and sale of "The Catholic Vindicator," that the pursuer, Mr Scott, had spoken favourably of it as a work of controversy; but before the work was concluded, the deponent understood Mr Scott to have endeavoured to injure the circulation of it,—but the deponent declines, and does not consider himself obliged to name the persons from whom he so heard; but that both the reports came from the same quarter.

8*to*. Had the witness access to know, whether or not the pursuer, Mr Scott, was one of the subscribers for the numbers of The Catholic Vindicator, while they continued to be published?

8th. To the eighth interrogatory, depones and answers, That he does not know that the pursuer, Mr Scott, was one of the subscribers for the numbers of The Catholic Vindicator, while they continued to be published.

Lastly,—That it shall be competent to the Commissioner, to put any question, or questions, to the witness, touching the matter in the cause, besides what they have been interrogated into, by the interrogatories and cross-interrogatories; and to require the witness to make such addition and explanations as he shall think necessary. That it shall be competent to the Commissioner to ask the witness whether he knows of any other matter, or thing, touching the matters in question in the cause, besides what he has been interrogated into. If yea, to declare the same, fully and at large, as if he had been particularly interrogated thereto.

Being interrogated by the Commissioner, at what time it was he saw Mr Scott, as above deponed to, depones and answers, That it was during the time that the publication was going forward, and, as he supposes, about the middle or towards the close of it.

Cross interrogatories to be put to William Eusebius Andrews, printer in London, In the action at the instance of the Rev. Andrew Scott, Roman Catholic Clergyman in Glasgow, against William M'Gavin, &c.

In primis. Was The Catholic Vindicator meant and intended to be an answer to The Protestant, or to certain numbers of it? and if so, specify the numbers.

1st. To the first of the cross interrogatories depones, and answers, That the work called The Catholic Vindicator was meant and intended to be an answer to a work entitled The Protestant generally, and not to any particular number.

2*do*. Were you solicited by others to write or publish such a work, and by whom? In particular, were you solicited to begin, or afterwards to carry on, this work by any Catholic or Catholics in Glasgow?

2d. To the second interrogatory depones and answers, That he was solicited to write and publish The Catholic Vindicator, but declines saying by whom—only, that he was not so solicited by the pursuer, Mr Scott, but he was so applied to by certain Catholics in Glasgow.

3*tio*. Did any of the Catholics in Glasgow agree to purchase, or to circulate a certain number of the said work; or did they come under any obligation to induce you to commence, or to continue the carrying on of this publication: and if so, name the person, or persons, and produce any agreement, or letters relative to such agreement or obligation?

3d. To the third cross interrogatory, depones and answers, That certain Catholics in Glasgow, did agree to take a certain quantity of copies of each number of the work, in order to indemnify the deponent, against any particular loss by the publication in Scotland; but the pursuer, Mr Scott, was not one of these; but the deponent declines to answer who they were, considering it as a private transaction.

4*to*. If Mr Andrews, in answer to Query 7th of the Interrogatories in chief, shall answer that the pursuer discouraged the publication of The Catholic Vindicator; let him be asked, in what manner, and by whom the pursuer expressed such discouragement, and in what terms he did so; and if by letter, produce the letters referring to that matter.

4th. To the fourth cross interrogatory, depones and answers, That he received a letter when the publication was going forward stating, that Mr Scott had expressed himself in strong terms against the deponent; and had said, that The Catholic Vindicator must be discouraged, else the Catholics would be implicated in the opinions of the deponent: That the deponent has the letter; but, considering it a private communication, he declines to produce it.

5*to*. Was The Catholic Vindicator encouraged and approved of, by a respectable part of the British Catholics? If so, name those by whom such approbation was given; and state how it was so given?

5th. To the fifth interrogatory, depones and answers, That The Catholic Vindicator was approved of by respectable English Catholics; but the deponent cannot say that it was encouraged, as it did not succeed. And the deponent declines to name those persons.

6*to*. Does the witness know, that the publishing of the different numbers of The Catholic Vindicator was announced by hand-bills in Glasgow, with certain references to the Work, called The Protestant, and the author of that Work? Was this done at his desire, or with his concurrence?

6th. To the sixth cross interrogatory, depones and answers, That he believes the publication of the different numbers of The Catholic Vindicator was announced by hand-bills in Glasgow; because the deponent printed those hand-bills, and sent them down with the Work to Glasgow; and that those hand-bills contained references to the work called The Protestant, and to the author of that work. All which is truth, as he shall answer to God.

(Signed) WILLIAM EUSEBIUS ANDREWS.
JAS. CHALMERS, Comr.
GEORGE A. MAZZONI, Clerk.

This and the four preceding pages contain the Return to the writ or commission, mentioned in the first page, or introduction.

(Signed) JAS. CHALMERS, Comr.
GEORGE A. MAZZONI, Clerk.

Mr JEFFREY—'To the answer to the fourth query, I wish the attention of the Jury to be directed; and I request it be read again.'

4*to*. "Where was this Work printed, and when was it commenced, and when was it discontinued?

4th. "To the fourth interrogatory, depones and answers, That the said Work was printed in London. That the work was commenced on the fifth day of December, in the year one thousand eight hundred and eighteen; and it was discontinued on the fourth day of December in the following year.

JOHN LOCHRIE examined by Mr COCKBURN.

Q. You were one of the collectors of contributions for building the Roman Catholic chapel at Glasgow?—A. I was.

Q. How long was you a collector?—A. I cannot pointedly recollect.

Q. Was it during the whole time of the building of the chapel?—A. It might be so.

Q. Did you receive instruction from Mr Scott, when you were appointed a collector?—A. I cannot say particularly. I got general instructions to go to those of the same religion about me, who were willing to contribute.

Q. Did you get instructions to urge persons to subscribe?—A. Not any.

Q. Did you ever hear Mr Scott in church point out any who did not subscribe?—A. Not any.

Q. Do you attend church?—A. Pretty often.

Q. Where was your district of collection?—A. Eight miles from Glasgow.

Q. Did Mr Scott ever visit persons in your district who did not subscribe?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you ever hear him refuse to baptize any children because their parents did not subscribe?—A. Never.

Q. Did you know him baptize in such circumstances?—A. Often.

Q. Had you ever instructions to abstain from asking contributions where there was sickness?—A. I considered I had power to do in that, as I might think proper.

Q. Did you often take from such persons?—A. No. Instead of asking from them, I contributed to their support.

Q. Did you ever know of masters being applied to and asked to keep the wages from their men for the contributions to the chapel?—A. Never.

Cross-examined by Mr MURRAY.

Q. How long were you a collector?—A. The most of the time the chapel was a building;—even before it was begun.

Q. To whom did you pay your collections?—A. I gave them to Mr Scott.

Q. When did you give him them?—A. When it was convenient for me to come into town.

Q. At what periods did you collect?—A. When convenient for contributors to pay me, which was according to circumstances; as for instance, according to the kind of work in which they were employed.

Q. You did not collect at any regular periods?—A. None whatever.

Q. Were there any particular days upon which you collected?—A. There were no particular days.

Q. Nor for paying to Mr Scott?—A. Nor for paying to him.

Q. Did Mr Scott mark the money you paid to him ?—A. I did not see. I did not know what he made of it.

Q. Was any thing marked in your book when you paid ?—A. I may say I had no book, I had a paper in which I marked the names of those who paid me.

Q. Do you know whether the other collectors had books ?—A. I do not know whether they had or had not.

JOHN HENNIKER examined by Mr COCKBURN.

Q. You are a merchant in Glasgow, I believe ?—A. I am

Q. A member of Mr Scott's congregation ?—A. I am.

Q. You did not come to Glasgow till after the new chapel was built ?—A. Just the day it was opened.

Q. Have you ever heard of a work called The Catholic Vindicator?—I have.

Q. Have you ever heard Mr Scott speak of that work ?—A. I have heard him disapprove of it very much.

Q. Did you ever know whether his disapprobation had any effect upon the sale of that work ?—A. I could not answer that question.

Q. Did you hear him disapprove of it more than once ?—A. I have heard him express disapprobation of it at my own house and other houses where I have been.

Q. Did you ever hear him approve of it ?—A. I heard him recommend purchasing up the work with a view to prevent loss to those engaged in it.

Cross-examined by Mr MONCREIFF.

Q. What did Mr Scott say when you heard him disapprove of this book ?—A. He neither approved of the book nor of the person who wrote it; he disapproved as much of the person who wrote it as of the pamphlet.

Q. Was it in the chapel he gave this recommendation to buy it up ?—A. Yes, it was.

Q. Were you one of the Committee for the management of The Vindicator?—A. The original committee of The Vindicator put my name in afterwards. They were in difficulty, and I wished to get them out of it. But I was not responsible for The Vindicator. I disapproved of it from the very commencement.

Q. Can you fix any date to the time when Mr Scott recommended the buying up of The Vindicator ?—A. I have no recollection.

Q. How long was it after you came to Glasgow ?—A. (A short pause, no answer.)

Q. How long before The Vindicator was given up ?—A. Some time.

LORD CHIEF COMMISSIONER—Q. You said you came to Glasgow at the time the chapel was opened ?—A. I went to London, and came back after that.

Q. Was The Vindicator published before or after you went to London ?—A. I should imagine that it was published about the year —— I have no recollection.

Q. Do you think it was before December, 1818 ?—A. I should imagine not.

Q. Then what time were you made a member of the committee to purchase it up ?—A. I should imagine, end of 1819 or 1820.

Mr COCKBURN—Q. You say Mr Scott expressed some opinion about The Vindicator at the chapel, it was not given out to the congregation ?—A. It was after some of the congregation were gone; it was after the service was over.

Mr MURRAY—Q. When did you return to Glasgow ?—A. I think I was married about 1818, and it was a short time before that; I think, April, 1818. I have resided in Glasgow since April, 1818.

Q. How long after that may it have been you heard Mr Scott recommend the purchasing of The Vindicator ?—A. I should imagine that it was later than Dec. 1819. I cannot be positive.

Q. That was after The Catholic Vindicator was published ? Had it been given up at that time ?—A. No, it had not.

Rev. Mr GORDON examined by Mr COCKBURN.

Q. You are a Catholic clergyman in Greenock ?—A. I am.

Q. Do you know Mr Scott of Glasgow ?—A. I do.

Q. Did you know a work called The Catholic Vindicator ? Have you ever heard of it ?—A. I have.

Q. Have you ever heard Mr Scott express an opinion upon that work ?—A. Upon several occasions.

Q. A favourable or unfavourable opinion ?—A. Unfavourable.

Q. Did you ever hear whether he encouraged or discouraged that work ?—A. I always understood that he discouraged that work.

Q. Do you know Mr Murphy ?—A. I do; I have known him long. I knew him many years ago.

Q. Do you remember the time he preached in the Roman Catholic chapel at Glasgow ?—A. I think it was about two years ago. I was often in his company at the time.

Q. Do you know The Protestant ?—A. I do.

Q. Do you understand certain parts of that work to contain an attack upon Mr Scott ?—A. I do certainly.

Q. Did you ever read that work ?—A. Parts of it.

Q. Did you ever read passages you considered to apply to Mr Scott ?—A. In some passages his name is mentioned.

(Some of the passages libelled on were handed to the witness.)

WITNESS—This upon the first page, when I read, I understood to apply to Mr Scott.

Q. Had this work a considerable circulation about Greenock ? Was it publicly commented on ?—A. I understood it was, in a meeting-house.

Q. Whose meeting?—A. The Rev. Mr Wilson's.

Q. Were ever any particular words put upon your own chapel?—A. Yes.

Q. What were they?—A. "Down with Popery" or "black Popery"—I do not remember which.

Q. Was that during the time The Protestant was going on?—It was.

Q. And was there ever any thing done to put down black Popery—or did the populace ever give any insults to you about that time?—A. They called after me "Roman Catholic Priest"—I do not know if that is an insult or not.

LORD CHIEF COMMISSIONER—Q. What is the meaning of this?

Mr. COCKBURN—We leave the Jury to infer what effect this Protestant would have upon Mr Scott.

Cross-examined by Mr MURRAY.

Q. Can you name the year when "Down with Popery" was put upon the wall of your chapel?—A. It was about the time of that publication.

Q. Had you ever seen any such thing before?—A. Upon the walls of the chapel? Never.

Q. Upon other walls in Greenock?—A. I do not recollect I ever did.

Q. Do you swear you do not recollect?—A. I certainly swear.

Q. Had you ever seen such words written before?—A. I have seen those words written; I have seen them, not upon a wall, but often, as in a public Newspaper.

Q. Did any body ever call you Roman Priest before?—A. Yes, about the time the chapel was building

Q. That was before The Protestant was published?—A. It was, certainly.

Q. So they called you Roman Priest before and after the publication?—A. The cry was revived about the time of the publication of The Protestant.

Q. Do you say that Mr Scott discouraged The Catholic Vindicator at its commencement?—A. He expressed his regret at it—he did not wish such a thing to be—he did not like the thing at all.

Q. Did you hear him talk of it afterwards?—A. Upon several occasions.

Q. What did he say?—A. He always talked of the work as a thing of which he disapproved.

Q. In what respect?—A. The writer of it not being a man that did justice to it, but arguing in a manner he would not do. He spoke of it as calculated to be productive of no good.

Mr COCKBURN—"The Court and Jury will attend to what we understand to be the first case put in defence, that of Mr Courtney. You will observe, that the Issue consists of two parts; one a refusal to baptize; and one a refusal to confess at Easter, 1815. The refusal of baptism is stated to have been given in October, 1814.

"I beg leave to give in the regular books kept on the occasion. In the communion books, both of 1814 and 1815, you will find this person entered."

Mr MONCREIFF—"Those are not evidence."

Mr COCKBURN—"I beg to give them in—we shall make them evidence. We must get on by degrees."

LORD CHIEF COMMISSIONER—"We should make the bar acquainted of what occurs to us as the regular course of proceeding in such a case.

"You are in a perfectly regular course of proceeding in the way you are adopting now, in meeting by anticipation the defender's Issues. I conceive a pursuer has in his option to do that if he think it the best course of proceeding; and, therefore, if you think so in this case, the Court will leave that to the discretion of the bar. But, when the party has adopted that course of proceeding, and meets the matter by anticipation, it is understood that that constitutes their case upon the merits of those points; but it is not understood that that would constitute the case of the other side of the bar.

"The Court cannot decide for the parties; but it would be quite unfit that the Court should let the bar go on without this explanation.

"The alternative is this. You are at liberty to go into a general answer of justification by anticipation, but you cannot, after their evidence, renew a general answer to their evidence. That is what I mean.

"In those Courts where this mode of trial has been long adopted, this has been uniformly the course of proceeding; and it does not appear to me to touch upon the law of Scotland. Therefore, when a party chooses to bring justification by anticipation, he may do so, but he is precluded afterwards from bringing more general evidence in justification."

Mr JEFFREY—"We are much indebted to your Lordship for suggesting the course which may be followed on an occasion which is novel in the practice here. We think we shall not endanger our cause by going on as we proposed, on the understanding that if any objection to evidence brought forward by them I trust we shall be indulged."

LORD CHIEF COMMISSIONER—"I thought it advisable to tell you what we have done."

Mr COCKBURN—"We have given in these two lists, then, in Courtney's case."

Mr MONCREIFF—"In what way is this to be evidence?"

Mr COCKBURN—"We cannot prove they are the communion lists without putting them down as such; and that is all we have yet done."

The Clerk of Court then read the fifth Issue. "Whether, about six years ago the pursuer did refuse to baptize the child of Philip M'Geechie, now in Manchester, late residenter in Glasgow, a person of the Roman Catholic persuasion, and a member of the pursuer's congregation, because the said M'Geechie was in arrear in his contribution to the said chapel."

JAMES ANDERSON examined by Mr JEFFREY.

Q. Are you Clerk of the Justiciary Court? Every body knows you are.—A. I am.

Q. Did you attend the spring Circuit at Glasgow in 1813?—A. The record is here.

Q. Is there any record of the trial of Philip M'Kenzie?—A. Philip M'Kenzie.

Q. Is he designated by any other name?—A. No.

Q. Mention the date?—A. 22d April, 1813.

Q. Of what was he accused?—A. Of the crime of theft by means of housebreaking.

Q. And what becomes of him?—A. The verdict recorded is, "The Jury were then enclosed and returned the following verdict. At Glasgow, the twenty-second day of April, 1813 years, the above assize having enclosed, made choice of the said W. M. Stirling to be their Chancellor, and the said Matthew Montgomerie to be their Clerk, and having considered the libel raised and pursued at the instance of his Majesty's advocate, for his Majesty's interest against Philip M'Kenzie, pannel, the interlocutor of relevancy thereon pronounced by the Court, and that no evidence has been adduced in proof of the libel; They all in one voice find the pannel not guilty of the crime libelled. In witness whereof, their said Chancellor and Clerk have subscribed these presents, as written on this and the preceding page in their names, and by their appointment, place and date foresaid.

(Signed) W. M. STIRLING, Chancellor.
MATT. MONTGOMERY, Clerk."

"The Lords in respect of the foregoing verdict assoilzie the pannel simpliciter and dismiss him from the bar."

(Signed) GEO. FERGUSSON.

Q. Is there any thing more in the record as to the proceedings?—A. The record bears, "The Advocate Depute having called John M'Kersie, one of the Police watchmen of the City of Glasgow, the first witness in the list annexed to the Indictment; the counsel for the pannel objected to this witness, as no person of that name was contained in the copy served on his client; and the said copy being produced, it appeared that an error had been committed at the Sheriff Clerk's Office, by inserting the name of William M'Kenzie in place of William M'Kersie; and he being the principal witness, the Advocate Depute declared he could not prove the Indictment.

Mr MONCREIFF—Q. But the name of the person accused — what is it? — A. Philip M'Kenzie.

Mr MONCREIFF—That is no evidence.

Mr JEFFREY—That is no evidence yet.

Mr MONCREIFF — Does he plead "Not Guilty?"

LORD GILLIES—He must have done so, from the proceedings which you have heard read.

HUGH ROBERTSON examined by Mr JEFFREY.

Mr JEFFREY—The Jury will recollect the article of the condescendence which was read.

Q. Is your name Hugh?—A. Yes.

Q. Do you reside in Glasgow?—A. I have resided in the same place for thirty years.

Q. Well, that is long enough—Did you know a person some years ago of the name of Philip M'Kenzie?—A. I have seen the man at different times.

Q. Did he ever go by another name?—A. I knew him by the name of M'Geechie, not M'Kenzie.

Q. He sometimes took the name of M'Kenzie?—A. I heard so afterwards.

Q. Do you remember if the person you allude to was tried at the Circuit Court at Glasgow?—A. The same man.

Q. Do you remember about what time?—A. I do not.

Q. How long ago was it?—A. It was a long, long, long time ago.

Q. Have you ever seen him since his trial?—A. Never; nor for a long time before it.

Q. Did you ever go with this man to the Reverend Mr Scott to get a child baptized?—A. Yes; we went from a public house where we were drinking together.

Q. Was that before, or long before the time of his trial?—A. Yes, I think it was before—it was before it.

Q. You said you have not seen him since his trial. If you have not seen him since the trial, you could not have gone to Mr Scott's since. By what names did he pass at the time you knew him in Glasgow?—A. M'Geechie or M'Kenzie.

Q. Did he pass by both names?—A. I think he did.

Q. Did you ever go with any other person than this man to the Reverend Mr Scott?—A. Never upon any other occasion.

Q. And you are the only Hugh Robertson at your place of residence?—A. There was another in it once, but there is none but me now.

(The witness was withdrawn.)

Mr JEFFREY—"I submit, that, from this testimony, all the parties are excused, and the other party is prevented from examining as to this matter farther; for the libel is, that within six years, this transaction took place. If we have identified M'Geechie with him who is upon the justiciary record; and if we have proved that this witness did accompany him upon one occasion only to Mr Scott, and that before the trial, the matter cannot be longer made the subject of evidence; for it was two years beyond the time in the libel. What is sworn to, bars both parties from farther investigation."

Mr MONCREIFF—"This is extraordinary. Am I not to cross-examine the witness? How does Mr Jeffrey know what would be the result of my cross-examination?"

LORD CHIEF COMMISSIONER—"If Mr Jeffrey thinks he has made out what he wants, he need examine no farther than he thinks proper. But that will not preclude the other party from their cross-examination."

Mr JEFFREY—"Then I shall go on with the examination."

(The witness was brought back.)

Q. Do you remember whether the time when you went to Mr Scott's was before the Catholic chapel was begun to be built?—A. It was a long time before it.

Q. I think you say you and this Philip M'Geechie had been drinking — were you sober?—A. I was not.

Q. Was he sober?—A. He was not.

Q. Do you recollect what passed at Mr Scott's?—A. We were both drunk.

Q. (The question was repeated to the witness.)—A. I beg pardon, I am dull of hearing.

Q. (The question was again repeated.)—A. When he went in, Mr Scott seemed to know him, and he asked what came of him this long time, and he spoke to him about his being so long away, not being in the Church for two years. He told me so himself before he went. And Mr Scott spoke to him, and gave him a good advice.

Q. Was the child carried there?—A. No, it was not there.

Q. There were just you and Philip. Was any thing said about baptizing the child?—A. Yes.

Q. Do you recollect what it was?—

(Here a short pause ensued.)

LORD GILLIES—"If you do not recollect, say so."

(The witness still continued silent.)

Mr JEFFREY—"Do you, or do you not recollect what passed? If you recollect, tell us what passed—If you do not recollect say so."

(The witness made no answer.)

LORD GILLIES—"Do you recollect or do you not recollect what passed?"

(The witness continued silent, looking towards Mr Scott.)

Mr JEFFREY—Had you any thing to drink this morning, Sir?

(Witness continued looking towards the pursuer.)

A MACER—"Will you have a drink of water?"

(Witness continued as above.)

Mr MONCREIFF—Look at me if you please—Were you at the trial of M'Geechie?—A. No.

Q. You did not see M'Geechie at the trial?—A. No; I was not at the trial.

Q. You are not quite sure whether it was before or after the trial you went to Mr Scott?—A. It was before.

Q. How long?—A. I could not tell.

Q. You went with him to Mr Scott, and Mr Scott gave him a good advice—What happened after that?—What did M'Geechie say?—A. When I met him in the public house, first and foremost, we had so much drink. He proposed to me to go to speak to Mr Scott, to speak to him about the christening of a child he had to baptize. He told me that he was not at Mr Scott's for these two years, and he would wish me to go along with him. He proposed to give me so much porter.

Q. What did Mr M'Geechie say to Mr Scott?—A. He went in and he told him that he had a child to baptize.

Q. What did Mr Scott say then?—A. Mr Scott asked him what came of him a long time, and spoke to him about his neglect of divine worship.

Q. Did he speak of any thing else?—A. And gave him a good advice, and told him before baptizing the child five shillings must be given towards the chapel,—"None of it goes to my private pocket, not a farthing." I then, like a drunk man, as I am at present, began to teach Mr Scott his duty.

LORD GILLIES—Have you been drinking any this morning?—A. I am drunk with something, I do not know what it is.

Mr MONCREIFF—Q. You have not been drinking?—A. I am drunk with something. It is appearing in this Court before a———

Q. How long have you been in the room with the other witnesses?—A. Since ten o'clock.

Q. Had you any thing to drink there?—A. Nothing but small beer.

LORD GILLIES—"He stated before he had nothing but spirits."

LORD CHIEF COMMISSIONER—"Recollect yourself before you give any answer. Turn to me, and I will tell you, if you should be hurried, to take time to recollect yourself."

Mr MONCREIFF—Q. You say Mr Scott said M'Geechie should pay five shillings, and it was not to go to his private pocket; did M'Geechie then pay the five shillings?

(The question was objected to by the other side of the bar.)

LORD CHIEF COMMISSIONER—"You must not lead upon a cross-examination."

Mr MONCREIFF—Q. I asked whether he paid the five shillings. Then I ask what did M'Geechie say?—A. M'Geechie said no more. It was I who began to speak, and to teach Mr Scott his duty.

Q. What did you say?—A. I told Mr Scott that ——— I do not remember the particular story—Mr Scott told me to go home and mind my business.

Q. You have not told us what you said to Mr Scott?—A. I said the child ought to be baptized, whatever difference there might be betwixt the parents and the church.

Q. Did he agree to baptize it? A. I said

Q. Did Mr Scott agree to baptize the child, without getting the five shillings?—A. Mr Scott said he had to pay the five shillings; and there was no more passed upon that subject but what I advanced. There was another word passed, I said that ———

Q. After what you said to Mr Scott, did you come away, or did any more pass?—A. I mentioned, like a drunk man, that this child might die, and its soul might go to hell. That is all that past.

Q. What did Mr Scott say, when you said that?—A. That is none of my business. That is the word that he said.

Q. Has any body threatened you, as to the evidence that you might give here?—A. There are so many altogether—

Q. In Glasgow?—No, nowhere.

Q. When did you see Mr Scott last?—A. Except on the street, not since then.

Mr JEFFREY—Q. Are you a Roman Catholic, or a Protestant?—A. I am of the Church of Scotland.

Q. You said, Mr Scott wanted five shillings for the chapel, and you said it was before the chapel began to be built:—then, for what was the money wanted?—

(The witness gave no answer.)

Q. Was there a Chapel building at Paisley at that time?

(The witness gave no answer.)

Q. Was it before the new chapel began to be built?—A. I cannot tell for what it was.

FELIX DONELLIE, examined by Mr COCKBURN.

Q. Do you know a man of the name of M'——? (From the notes it is not clear which of the names were mentioned.)—A. I do.

Q. Had he ever any other name?—A. Never that I knew him by. Since these twelve months I heard him called M'—— I have been asked if I knew him by that name.

Q. Do you know that he was brought to trial some years ago?—A. I think about seven years ago.

Q. Do you remember about what time of year?—A. I think at Lammas, or in the summer time.

Q. Have you seen him lately?—A. Yes, on the sixteenth of this month in Lancaster prison.

Q. That is the man you spoke of, what was he doing there?—A. He was put in there for passing bad money.

Q. How do you know that?—A. I went to inquire about him, and I have papers in my pocket to show—

Mr MONCREIFF—"That will not do."

COURT—"It will not do."

Mr COCKBURN—Q. Did he tell you he was committed for passing bad money?—A. He told me they had taken him, and found a quantity of bad money on him, and that he was condemned in a fine of twenty pounds,* and to three years imprisonment.

(The witness took a paper out of his pocket.)

Q. Whom did you get that from?—A. In Chester from the Justice's Clerk.

Q. Have you any more papers?—A. Yes.

(The Witness produced some written papers.)

Q. Did you see this gentleman sign the paper?—A. Yes.

Mr COCKBURN—"The papers are according to the forms of the English law. In order to put this matter in shape, I observe, this witness has sworn he saw the gentleman sign the paper. And there is his own signature. He also saw M'Geechie in jail, and he has told you what passed about his conviction. I now tender that as evidence of Mr M'Geechie's imprisonment."

Q. Were you directed to go to identify M'Geechie?—A. Yes.

Mr COCKBURN—"I have made the tender. It will be for the other party to offer any objections."

(One of the productions was handed to the Lord Chief Commissioner.)

LORD CHIEF COMMISSIONER—"That is a regular conviction, which, if regularly proved, would be regular evidence."

WITNESS—"He ordered his Clerk to put the seal to it, which was done in my presence at Preston."

LORD CHIEF COMMISSIONER—"The way this evidence stands, is this. The witness went to Lancaster and found this man, and so far there is an identification that the same person who was tried at Glasgow, is in the jail at Lancaster; and the witness has told you what that man stated as to his imprisonment. That is prima facie evidence he is in the jail of Lancaster for that offence. It is for the other party to rebut that. Now that precludes all necessity for deciding any thing upon documentary evidence. The one is an objection arising out of a form—the other is how far it is regularly acceptable."

Mr MONCREIFF—"I object to the receiving of that document. As to any thing else I shall go on to the examination."

Mr JEFFREY—Q. The person you saw at Lancaster, was the person you knew at Glasgow under the name of M'——?—A. Yes.

Mr MONCREIFF—Q. Did you hear any person call him M'Kenzie?—A. I have. And he writes himself M'Kenzie.

Q. Were you present at the trial?—A. No, but he himself next day told me he got clear,

---

* Or to find security to this amount.

and he told me how he got clear, viz. from a wrong word in his indictment.

Q. Did he tell you what the wrong word was?—A. No, Sir.

Q. What time of the year was this trial?—A. I think at Lammas, or after it. It was not in the winter time.

Mr JEFFREY—Q. You knew this M'Kenzie before the time of his trial?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you ever hear him mention any thing of going with a child to baptize, to the Rev. Mr Scott?—A. Yes.

Q. Before his trial?—A. Yes.

(The examination was objected to by the other side of the bar.)

Mr JEFFREY—"I know it is not evidence to the fact itself, but it is to the point of time, to M'Geechie's having gone to Mr Scott previous to the trial, to which the witness spoke."

Q. Was it before the trial?—A. Yes, a good while.

Q. Did he mention any person went along with him?—A. Robertson.

Q. And you are sure it was before the trial? A. I am sure it was before the trial.

LORD CHIEF COMMISSIONER—Q. When you went to the jail at Lancaster, you found a person answering to the name of M'Geechie, or M'Kenzie?—A. I asked for M'Keegan.

Q. When you asked for him, whom did you find?—A. The man was brought down. When he was brought down, I stated he was the person for whom I inquired. One of the gentlemen who went with me asked him if he knew me, and he came forward and shook hands with me.

Q. That person came down to you on your asking for M'Keegan?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you learn he had gone under any other name at Manchester?—A. I heard he had gone under the name of M'Kenzie.

Q. Was the person who came and shook hands with you, the same person who came to you the day after he had been tried?—A. The same person.

Q. Did any thing more pass between him and you at the jail?—A. I asked him if he recollected any thing at the time about the baptism. He said he went to speak to Mr Scott about it, and Mr Scott would not baptize, till he would come forward to his duty, as he had not come forward for some time before.

Q. Was the person you had the conversation with, a person who went into the jail at Lancaster, by the name of M'Kenzie?—A. Yes.

Mr MONCREIFF—Dou you remember the year of the trial you spoke of?—A. I do not recollect the year. There was a man of the name of Ferguson, tried the same day, who died.

Q. How did he die?—A. He was hanged. M'Keegan was the next that came up for trial.

LORD CHIEF COMMISSIONER—How many years ago was it?—A. I think better than six.

Mr COCKBURN—"The Record shows the man spoken of was condemned the same day M'Kenzie got off."

Mr MONCREIFF—Q. Was it before the trial that this man spoke to you about having gone to Mr Scott?—A. Yes it was.

Q. Are you sure of that?—A. I am positive it was before. He mentioned that Robertson went along with him.

Mr COCKBURN—"I am now going to the case of Fleming."

EDWARD NOON examined by Mr COCKBURN.

Q. You are a dyer, I believe?—A. Yes.

Q. Was you ever in the dye-work of Mr Fleming at Hutchesontown, Glasgow?—A. Yes.

Q. How long ago?—A. Six years ago.

Q. How many workmen were there at the time?—A. John Dalzel for one;—

Q. How many?—A. About eight.

Q. Were those all Catholics?—A. Yes.

Q. Was there a Mr Stevenson?—A. Yes.

Q. He was in company with the Flemings?—A. Yes

Q. Do you remember the Catholic chapel being built?—A. Yes.

Q. You just gave what you chose of contribution towards building?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you ever wait upon Mr Scott and pay him any thing?—A. Yes.

Q. How much?—A. Five shillings.

Q. Had you any talk with him about the rest of the workmen?—A. I told him we had a mind to pay a little more.

Q. You were under collectors at that time?—A. A part of us were under collectors. We got notice from Kain and Hyde, that we were to pay that money.

Q. Who were they?—A. Manufacturers.

Q. Did you ever see Mr Scott with any of those persons coming into the work?—A. Yes.

Q. Mr Scott and Mr Stevenson by themselves?—A. They never said any thing in my hearing.

Q. Were the Messrs Flemings there?—A. There was none but John Stevenson himself.

Q. What took place when they came?—A. I do not know.

Q. Was Mr Scott ever at the work but on that occasion?—A. Never that I saw.

Q. And you say he did nothing?—A. Nothing, that I saw.

Q. Was he looking through the works?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you ever hear him make any application to any body, to stop your wages?—A. Never.

Q. Was any of your wages ever stopped to contribute to the chapel?—A. No; full wages were paid by the master.

JOHN M'DIARMID.

Q. Are you a dyer?—A. Yes.

Q. Were you ever with the Flemings at Glasgow?—A. Yes.

Q. How long since?—A. In 1813.

Q. Were you there after that?—A. Yes.

Q. For some years ?—A. I was three years altogether.

Q. Were you a subscriber to the Catholic chapel ?—A. I was.

Q. A voluntary one ?—A. Yes.

Q. Was ever any part of your wages stopped for it ?—A. Not a farthing.

Q. Did you ever see Mr Scott at the Flemings' work ?—A. Only once.

Q. Upon that occasion did he say any thing to the men ?—A. He only went through the work.

Q. Did he ever apply to have your wages stopped ?—A. Not that I know of.

Q. Did you pay your subscription to the collector ?—A. Yes.

Q. What was his name ?—A. Rodger Queen.

Q. Did you call upon Queen with the money ?—A. Yes.

Q. How much was it ?—A. A shilling in the fortnight.

Mr COCKBURN—"I am next going to the case of Drain. The statement given in the answers to the condescendence about this case of Drain, is, that this was the man, whose child was apparently dying, when he applied to Mr Scott for baptism; and who, on being refused, went to Paisley and got it baptized by Bishop Paterson.

The Issue is, "Whether, on or about the month of June, 1818, the pursuer did refuse to baptize the child of John Drain, weaver in Duke Street, Glasgow; one of the contributors of the Catholic chapel aforesaid, because the said Drain was then in arrears of his contribution to said chapel."

BISHOP PATERSON.

Q. You are a Catholic Bishop I understand ?—A. Yes.

Q. You have occasionally done duty at Paisley ?—A. Yes.

Q. You have baptized children there ? A. O Yes.

Q. Did you leave that residence and go abroad at any time ?—A. Yes, in 1817.

Q. How long did you remain abroad ?—A. About a year, I think.

(Some letters were handed to the witness.)

Q. Are those in your own handwriting, Sir ?—A. Yes.

Q. Read the dates of them ?—A. One is dated, Paris, 2d June, 1818. The second is from London, 27th August, 1818.

Q. You recollect being at those places at those dates ?—A. Yes.

Q. And you had not been at Paisley in the interim ?—A. No; I was at Paisley, but long after that time. I mean to say that I left Paisley in 1817, and I never returned there to officiate afterwards.

Q. What time did you leave it ?—A. About Easter.

Q Did you keep a register of baptisms there at that time ?—A. Yes.

(A book was handed to the witness.)

Q. Can you say from that book what was the last entry you made in it before leaving Paisley. What is the date of your last entry ?—A. I do not see any after the 24th of March, 1817.

Q. And did you ever make any entry since that time ?—A. Not that I recollect.

(A particular page was pointed out to the witness.)

Q. Look at the top of that page, and have the goodness to read what is written there.

(Witness read a record of the baptism of a child of John Drain, dated July 30th, 1818, signed, JAMES M'LACHLAN.)

Q. Do you know Mr M'Lachlan ?—A. Yes.

Q. He was officiating there ?—A. Yes.

Q. And that is his handwriting ?—A. I think it is.

Q. If persons supposed guilty of bigamy or adultery were living together, would you baptize their child before they separated ?—A. I conceive it a duty not to baptize till separation is insisted on, unless there is imminent danger of death.

Mr MONCREIFF—"This case of Drain we intend to prove as it stands in the Issues. They have read the answers to the condescendence, and they have examined Bishop Paterson. What I want is, that it should be arranged in some way that the Bishop should be at hand."

(It was agreed that Bishop Paterson should remain in Court.)

CHRISTIAN MURE.

Q. Do you know a man of the name of John Drain ?—A. Yes.

Q. Were you ever married to John Drain ?—

Mr MONCREIFF—"They are not entitled to put that question."

(The witness was withdrawn.)

Mr MONCREIFF—"There are several objections. In the first place, I have to observe to your Lordships, that they are pursuing here, the course they have followed throughout the case, by bringing forward evidence of special facts, of which there is not the slightest notice upon any part of the record, and upon which it was impossible for the defender to come prepared.

"This John Drain, as the husband of another woman than the witness, had a child actually baptized, and they propose to prove the bastardy of that child. And by what sort of evidence do they mean to establish that fact ? Do they bring documentary evidence ? Did they state the fact which they mean to prove in their evidence ? Do they bring forward the evidence of any clergyman, or any witness who was present at the alleged marriage ? They call a woman, and they wish to prove by herself she was married to John Drain, who is at this moment habit and repute husband to another woman. Can they do this without notice to us ? to Drain ? to the other woman? It is not evidence at all, to allow a woman to prove a marriage in her own favour. Are they entitled to prove what they want? I apprehend the objections are of a very serious nature, and if they intended to prove any such fact, they ought to have given notice of their intention, and to have brought very different evidence than that of the woman herself."

LORD GILLIES—"There is no prima facie evidence that the child was illegitimate."

Mr COCKBURN—"We have the two wives, each with her certificate of marriage in her pocket."

Mr MONCREIFF—"That is different when they make that the substantive fact."

Mr COCKBURN—"I want to prove that Mr Scott had good reason to refuse baptizing the child. The other party may prove the refusal—and I am entitled to prove a good cause for it, as well as they are entitled to prove a guilty one."

Mr MONCREIFF—"We come to the matter of fact that he did refuse the baptism; and let them prove what he assigned as his reason for doing so. If they found upon a record, they should produce it. They have no right to make such a production as they propose to offer."

LORD CHIEF COMMISSIONER—"The question is, whether this woman is entitled to prove her marriage."

Mr JEFFREY—"If she was standing in the Commissary Court, insisting in a marriage against an unwilling husband, the case would be different from the present. But in a question where she has no interest, and where her interest cannot be affected by what takes place, we submit the fact, as it is one to which she is a competent evidence. We do not mean to rest the fact on her bare statement; we shall produce a document which she has a right to retain, which we did not know of till lately, a regular certificate of her marriage; and we can establish by other witnesses she lived openly for some time in the character of this man's wife. And are we to be barred in this proof at the very commencement? Nobody can stand up for Mr Drain and say you must not fix a wife upon him. We want to prove habili modo this person is known to be living in bigamy. Both wives are proposed to be brought forward as witnesses; and the historical fact is of importance to this case."

Mr MONCREIFF—"It is not a correct way of proceeding. She was not admissible in the beginning of the trial. This is the person as to whom they asked our consent to pass from an objection as to her designation. It was impossible for us to have made any inquiries from the mode in which she was designed. It was impossible we could be prepared for such evidence."

Mr COCKBURN—"She might claim the rank although she could not bring sufficient proof to establish her marriage."

Mr MONCREIFF—"We do not believe what is stated on the subject."

LORD CHIEF COMMISSIONER—"Any evidence is admissible or not, according to the circumstances to which it is to apply. The question is, whether in truth or in fact, John Drain's child was refused to be baptized, until payment of the arrears of his contribution to the chapel; or whether there was another probable reason for the refusal of the baptism. You have it in evidence, and even if you had it not in evidence, it is obvious to common sense, if a person comes in a doubtful shape as to whether his marriage is legitimate or not, the fact would be investigated. Then you are to establish by evidence, such evidence as is applicable to that subject matter, whether there was enough to induce refusal of baptism in the case in question. If a woman were to come forward and say, that child is the child of a person who was married to me, would a clergyman not take that fact into consideration, and are we not in such circumstances to take into consideration what makes out that justification? We are not here in a situation to call upon the party to produce the best evidence the case admits of, to make out a marriage, but only such evidence as makes out a belief on the part of the clergyman, that it was his duty in these circumstances to refuse baptizing the child.

"As to the designation of the woman, her name and her residence are established."

Mr MONCREIFF—"I object to the evidence upon three grounds. First because it is not competent to prove by a woman's evidence her marriage, when it appears that the man whom she claims as her husband is married to another woman. Secondly, because it is incompetent to prove a special fact, as a crime against John Drain in this case. The third ground is, that we were entitled to notice of any such fact, and that she should have been designed either as the wife, or as claiming to be the wife of John Drain."

(The witness was brought back.)

Q. Were you ever married to this John Drain?—A. Yes.

Q. When was that? What year?—A. Six years past; in March, 1815.

Q. Who married you?—A. I have the lines in my pocket.

Mr MONCREIFF—"I object to that as evidence."

WITNESS—"It was John M'Leod, Minister in Glasgow, Minister of the Chapel of Ease.

Q. Had you been cried in the Church before this?—A. Yes; in the Barony.

Q. Had you any children by this John Drain?—A. Yes.

Q. How many?—A. One.

Q. How long did you live with him?—A. Fourteen weeks.

Q. Were you ever divorced from him?—A. No; he went off.

Q. Did he go with any body?—A. He went away with one Bell Scott. It is reported to me that he is with one—— (Name not distinctly ascertained from the short hand notes.)

Q. He does not live with Bell Scott now?—A. No.

Q. Who gave you this, (the certificate of marriage,) was it the Minister or who?—A. Yes.

Mr COCKBURN—"I propose to produce the certificate."

Mr JEFFREY—"We have as much right to have it produced, as they had to the production of what was in Bowman's possession."

(Here there was a short discussion whether the certificate should be received.)

Mr MONCREIFF—Q. Where do you live now?—A. Kailyards. I live with my brother.

Q. In whose house?—A. A house of my brother's, at Kailyards, in Old Monkland.

Q. You do not live near Airdrie. How far from Airdrie is your residence?—A. Near four miles.

Q. In what parish?—A. Old Monkland.

Q. What name do you go by?—A. Christian Mure; or by that of my husband.

Q. Are you called Mrs Drain?—A. Yes.

Mr MONCREIFF—"I am entitled to say this designation was intentional, for the purpose of concealment, and I submit that the deposition ought to be cancelled."

Mr COCKBURN—"It is too late at any rate."

LORD GILLIES—"Is there such a place as Kailyards where the witness resides, and that near Airdrie?"

Mr JEFFREY—"The town of Airdrie is in the parish of Old Monkland; and could any different description of the witness have been better?"

Mr MONCREIFF—"Yes; if they had designed her, as claiming to be the wife of John Drain."

Mr COCKBURN—"Then how would you have designed Isabella Scott?"

Mr MONCREIFF—"I take a bill of exceptions that she is not sufficiently designed. We do not object to the Christian name."

LORD GILLIES—"Your objection is, that Kailyards is not near Airdrie?"

Mr MONCREIFF—"And that she is not designed as wife of John Drain, or claiming to be such; and that she is falsely designed as residing near Airdrie."

LORD GILLIES—"I hold four miles to be near Airdrie. Libberton near Edinburgh would do as a designation of residence."

Mr MONCREIFF—"The cases are very different."

LORD CHIEF COMMISSIONER—"It appears on the cross-examination of the witness, and not before, that she lives four miles from Airdrie."

Mr STEPHEN GRAY.

Q. Are you Depute Clerk of the Peace of the Lower Ward of Lanarkshire?—A. I am.

Q. Have you the record with you?—A. Yes. (A particular part of it was pointed out to the witness.)

Q. Explain to the Jury what that is?—A. That is a complaint by the Procurator Fiscal to the Justices, that John Drain and Isabella Scott had been irregularly married; and he wants the fines imposed. John Drain and Isabella Scott declared they had been irregularly married, and were fined in one hundred merks Scots.

Mr. COCKBURN—"I am not sure whether the evidence on our part is closed or not. We think there are no Issues put in here for the defender, but the four which I have now gone over; and the question I have now to ask is, whether they hold they are entitled to go into any special evidence as to the case of Hanlen. If we are to reprobate on that case, then that is enough."

LORD CHIEF COMMISSIONER—"Till they come forward with their case, we cannot call upon them to say what they will do. You put in books Nos. 14 and 15 relating to communion, which I have marked as proposed to be delivered in."

Mr JEFFREY—"As to those books, Bishop Cameron stated such books are kept by the clergy, and, therefore, they could not be certified or proved by the clergyman who is a party here. We conceive we do all we are bound to do in putting them in."

Mr MONCREIFF—"They cannot be received."

LORD CHIEF COMMISSIONER—"Though you cannot prove them by the pursuer himself, you may prove they are regularly kept books as such books are kept."

Mr MONCREIFF—"I do not admit any thing."

Mr COCKBURN—"Then we shall prove the handwriting by the two witnesses who are in Court."

(Bishops Cameron and Paterson stated their belief that the books were in the handwriting of Mr Scott.)

Mr MONCREIFF—"I submit those books cannot be received in evidence."

LORD CHIEF COMMISSIONER—"The bishop stated they are for the private satisfaction of the clergyman, and the two stated their belief as to his handwriting."

Mr MONCREIFF—"Bishop Cameron did not say that it was part of the duty of the clergyman to keep those books, and they are not submitted to his superiors. We object to the evidence."

(The Judges deliberated for a few moments.)

LORD CHIEF COMMISSIONER—"The opinion of the Court is, they cannot be received in evidence."

Mr COCKBURN—"We give in the defences and answers to the condescendence of the other defenders."

Mr MONCREIFF—"Gentlemen of the Jury, I have to address you on the part of the defender, Mr M'Gavin, and the two other defenders, Messrs Andrew and James Duncan, who are printers of this work called The Protestant.

"Mr M'Gavin stands here charged as having been guilty of falsely and maliciously printing the statements which are contained in those Issues, to the damage and injury of the pursuer; and in the very outset, I pray you to take notice, that the whole pith and marrow of the case lies in the charge, that whatever Mr M'Gavin did, he did not only falsely but maliciously. I may perhaps take the liberty of observing, that on the face of those Issues that charge is refuted to any person of common sense; because you find embodied in one of those Issues, quite conclusive and unanswerable evidence, that, as to a part at least, and that is sufficient to the purpose, it is admitted Mr M'Gavin had reasonable, and, at all events, apparently conclusive information.

"The charge as it is stated, hangs upon three or four passages of a work published by Mr M'Gavin through a series of years; three or four passages picked carefully and detached from the whole context and history of the work. They place those passages before you, and they ask you, whether they do not imply a false and malicious charge against the pursuer.

"There was a little art in the way of presenting that article to you, by reading from a few loose leaves as if that were the work of The Protestant. Those few passages before you were picked out of two octavo volumes, which had been written by this gentleman upon the subject to which the work relates; and it must be quite evident to you that no man can do justice to such a case, or judge whether this was done maliciously by Mr M'Gavin or not, unless he have made himself acquainted with the general scope of the whole work. But I need not tell you that words which, taken by themselves, may appear to have one effect, may, when connected with the progress and general scope and object of the work, convey an entirely different impression to the persons who consider it as a whole.

"And this is not a miscellaneous work where things detached are treated of. The passages which relate to Mr Scott (as they say at least, and as to which, presently) are passages which occur in the middle of arguments tending to general objects; and the whole book is upon a subject, in treating of which, Mr M'Gavin might not have thought proper to allude to Mr Scott at all.

"I am well aware, that from the nature of the trial in which we are engaged, a peremptory diet when you must make up your minds from the evidence before you, and from such observations as his Lordship may address to you, there is an impossibility of your giving the matter that attention which I say it requires, because I am aware you cannot have an opportunity of perusing the work in which those passages occur. My friend told you, my client is entitled to found upon the whole work. That observation was made, but on the other side, I say it is utterly impossible for any man to judge properly of those Issues without sitting down to peruse the work regularly.

"But, notwithstanding this, it is an indispensable part of my duty upon this occasion, to endeavour to bring before you the origin of this work, and the progress of it to the end of it, or rather the present state of it, and to show you in what manner Mr M'Gavin was led into those observations upon which this demand of damages is given.

"Mr M'Gavin is, as we shall prove to you, a person very well known in the place where he himself resides. You have heard a great many harsh statements made against him to-day, a great many inferences of his intentions and motives; but I state to you that where he is known, he is known well as a person utterly incapable of that malice which is here ascribed to him; and a person who devotes his time and money to a great extent to the promotion of the interests of his fellow-countrymen, and is in the habit of doing so, not only for his Protestant brethren, but for the people of the Roman Catholic persuasion also.

"Mr M'Gavin is a Protestant; he is a pretty zealous one; I hope that will never be considered a reproach in this country. It happened that this chapel was built by certain means which have been partly explained to you, and it has been stated that the first use to which it was put, was for an Oratorio,* a musical meeting, a performance of music relative to a very sacred subject, and of that meeting I believe the profits were intended to be applied to the benefit of certain schools for the Catholic children.

"It has been stated, that, before that time, Mr M'Gavin had never spoken a word against Mr Scott; and that has been founded on as a circumstance against him. I found upon it as in his favour; that, up to that moment, Mr M'Gavin had neither written nor spoken a word against Mr Scott.

"The paragraph in The Glasgow Chronicle of 23d May, 1818, which refers to the meeting, is in the following terms: 'We feel pleasure in noticing the numerous and respectable auditory which was assembled at the Oratorio on Thursday last. The zeal and activity of the directors, the alacrity and pleasure with which their solicitations in behalf of a charitable and philanthropic institution were complied with, the great respect paid alike to the subject and the place, form a pleasing and characteristic feature of the age, and must afford an inexhaustible fund of pleasing reflection to the contemplative Christian. May we not hope, that these reasons, and the general satisfaction afforded by the performance, will induce Bishop Cameron to grant his permission for another Oratorio at a future period? We cannot close the subject, without offering our mead of praise to Mr de Monti for his extraordinary exertions, which the shortness of the notice required.'

* It was so stated by counsel on the other side, but it is a mistake. The chapel had been used for public worship more than a year before the Oratorio.

"It is not a matter of great importance (that I admit) in what terms an advertisement of that kind is expressed; but it struck the eye of Mr M'Gavin, and, if that was of little importance in itself, it was of at least as little importance to Mr Scott that Mr M'Gavin should write a few lines to the Newspaper. 'There are two or three words in your paper of last Saturday, on which I beg leave to animadvert a little. They are in the paragraph relating to the Oratorio in the Catholic chapel:—'The great respect paid alike to the subject and the place.' That was the beginning of the thing. It is not alleged there is any libel there. Mr M'Gavin goes on. 'I hope that the highly respectable company which assembled in the Catholic chapel last Thursday, paid great respect to the subject that was said or sung there that day. I can conceive no subject so important and interesting to a devout mind. It embraces nothing less than the salvation of the world, by the incarnation and death of the Son of God. I think it impossible that any Christian should make this a subject of amusement; and it was right to regard it with all possible respect and devotion. But it appears to me somewhat strange, that they should have paid the like respect to the place. Does the writer of the paragraph really believe that the building is as much to be respected, or to be regarded with the same kind of respect, as the most solemn passages of the word of God? Does he in fact believe that the stones and timber of the Catholic chapel are more holy than the materials of its neighbour, the Town's Hospital; or of its other neighbour, the Glass Bottle Manufactory? I know there is a Church, every stone of which is holy; but this is neither the High Church of Glasgow, nor St George's, nor the Tabernacle, nor yet the Catholic chapel in Clyde Street.'

"That is the scope of the first letter which he wrote, and it is all the substance of it. He did not impute what he animadverted upon to Mr Scott,—he did not impute it to a Catholic;—and he states, he did not believe at the time that it was a Catholic who wrote the advertisement upon which he commented; and he was rather correcting the error of Protestant brethren, than entering into any controversy with Catholics.

"It is of importance that the matter began in this way; and you will see how it went on. Mr M'Gavin did no more till he was forced to do it. A person, an overzealous friend, perhaps some friend of Mr Scott's, a gentleman in Glasgow, begins a controversy by sitting down to write a letter in answer to this letter of Mr M'Gavin's, in which he proposes to 'expose the weakness and futility of censorious bigotry.' The Catholic doctrine is, that there is something sacred in the place as well as in the subject. This writer says, 'I saw the paragraph which your correspondent alludes to, and am certainly astonished at the handle which he has made of it: paying respect to the house of God seems to have given him very great offence, and drawn from him a question as ridiculous as it is shameful:—Does he (the writer of the paragraph) in fact believe that the stones and timber of the Catholic chapel, are more holy than the materials of its neighbour, the Town Hospital; or of its other neighbour, the Glass Bottle Manufactory? According to the same principle, I suppose your correspondent would assert, that the ground whereon Moses stood, when he beheld the burning bush, was not more holy than the Green of Glasgow; or that the temple of Jerusalem, which I believe was partly composed of 'stones and timber,' was not more sacred than the theatre: yet we are informed, in the sacred Scriptures, that our Saviour was so offended at the disrespect paid to his house, that he not only reproached the buyers and sellers therein, but even personally chastised them.'

"That was entering into one of the very arguments constantly resorted to by the Catholics against the Protestants, in order to maintain the sacredness of the place; it was going into the controversy by one of the arguments that were subsequently triumphantly refuted by Mr M'Gavin in his after-writings. Amicus Veritatis proceeds, 'Were we to analyze all things that have been called holy, we would find them to consist in substance of mere matter: but the union or combination of matter, its application to pious purposes, and its consecration to Almighty God, certainly is not unworthy of being 'called holy,' and consequently deserving of a more sacred regard than the property of a glass blower, or even a Town's Hospital.'

"This led Mr M'Gavin to write an answer to that letter, and that letter also was upon general matter, not in the least in allusion to Mr Scott or his chapel. It is entirely upon the general question as to the sacredness of places, going back to the illustrations against him, and doing his best to refute them.

"I told you I would not go over these things minutely, but I think it of importance to give you a general summary of what happened; and it is of importance to know that five or six different letters were written before any allusion was made to Mr Scott.

"In that very letter Amicus Veritatis says, 'Thank Heaven! the phantoms raised by bigotry and by prejudice have fled before the light of reason, the darkness which for a time overspread our horizon, is dissipating into the more chastened ray of liberality and philanthropy.' And Mr M'Gavin goes on to state, 'It is amusing to hear a Catholic charging his Protestant neighbour with bigotry, and thanking heaven that the darkness which for a time overspread our horizon, is dissipating into the more chastened ray of liberality and philanthropy. I suppose the time here referred to, is that which has elapsed since the Reformation; and of course the light which is now about to rise is that of the dark ages.'

"This was not enough. Amicus Veritatis was not sufficient for the controversy with Mr M'Gavin, and another stepped forward under the name of Pax, and he makes a new attack; and then Mr M'Gavin makes an answer, partly to the one, and partly to the other. He could not exhaust what occurred to him in one letter, within the limits of a Newspaper, and therefore he takes another day to go on.

"Mr M'Gavin had mentioned the subject of indulgences, and there was a new controversy raised. They denied that it ever had been a Catholic doctrine, that the Pope, or any other under him, could give indulgence for the commission of sin. That opened a new field certainly—they raised it, and entered into it with great zeal;—and when Mr M'Gavin cited an example of an indulgence granted to an ancient family, they put to him to name the person who had it, and the person who had seen it.

"This subject of indulgences produced a great deal of discussion. Pax wrote one letter about them—then Amicus Veritatis another; and Mr M'Gavin wrote one from which I shall read a passage. He is writing on the subject of plenary indulgences, and he takes the liberty of quoting from a catechism which had come into his hands, which he understood to be a Catholic catechism of authority, though translated by a Protestant, of which an objection was made afterwards. He made these remarks; and I trust there is not one of you who will believe that when Mr M'Gavin wrote that passage, he was under the influence of any feeling or spirit of malice. It was against that doctrine of indulgence he was writing, according to his understanding of it;—and here is what he says; 'Perhaps some of your Protestant readers will not, at first sight, perceive the enormous wickedness of this; but I appeal to every serious and enlightened Christian, whether he can imagine greater wickedness than an attempt to do what God has declared that it is impossible that a creature can do, and what he declares to be already perfectly accomplished, not by a mere creature, but by his own Son? The revelation of divine mercy by Jesus Christ, and the command to believe in him, is virtually a command to cease from every attempt to satisfy divine justice for ourselves, or to make our peace with God; but the Church of Rome sets its miserable votaries to a work which it is not only impossible for them to do, but the very attempt to do which is an act of rebellion against God. To satisfy divine justice! The man who attempts to do this, or who thinks he can do it, must have as low ideas of the divine Being, as the man who sees and worships his God in a stock or a stone, or any other work of his own hands. Hence the connection of this doctrine of indulgences with the worship of saints and images, and the uniting the merit of the saints with that of the Saviour, which shows that the poor Papist looks upon God as such a one as himself. Christ has satisfied Divine justice by the sacrifice of himself once for all; and every man that believes in him becomes interested in that sacrifice: the justice of God is satisfied with regard to him; the anger of God is turned away from him; he needs no other sacrifice or satisfaction; and instead of attempting to satisfy divine justice by his own penances, or the divine law by his own doings, he is taught, from a principle of love and gratitude, as a saved sinner, to live a life of humility and obedience to his heavenly Father. This is the true Catholic: this is a member of the Church universal, which unites the earth to heaven.'

"I make no apology for reading that serious matter to you, because I apprehend it is deeply interwoven with this case. It was under the impression of errors thus forced upon him by writers who took notice of his unimportant observation about the place;—it was from that that Mr M'Gavin began to write seriously in the Protestant.

"Up to that time, not a word was pretended to be said against Mr Scott. My friend (Mr Cockburn) passed over all the intermediate time that I have noticed.

"Having written this, Mr M'Gavin was immediately assailed by Pax, who wrote another letter; and he says in that letter: 'I feel myself forcibly called upon to notice his letter of Saturday last, which, if I had no other, is a convincing proof of the truth of my remarks. He argues, as yet, on mere supposition, unsupported by a single fact, and is silent on those truths opposed to his fallacious assertions.'

"My client then wrote a pretty long letter,—three of those close leaves in reply to Pax. It is a theological argument altogether, and there was not a word about Mr Scott.

"He was still answered by another letter by Amicus Veritatis, who continued to assert, 'That it never was the doctrine of the Catholic church, that a Pope or a Bishop could grant an indulgence to commit sin;' and proceeded to say, 'With what a face of effrontery can your correspondent come forward and declare to the public, that such are the principles of a body of men who have been celebrated for every Christian virtue; and who publicly abjure, upon their most solemn oaths, the abominable principles imputed to them.'

"My client wrote still another letter in answer to Amicus Veritatis, but he stated in it that he had not exhausted the subject, because they had alluded to Mr Hervey as an authority, and he wished to make some observations upon that.

"It was while the controversy was thus going on, provoked as Mr M'Gavin was, that he wrote the first letter that is founded upon, dated 26th June, 1818. He had been going on writing from the twenty-third of May,—four months before that letter made its appearance at all. That letter begins with a consideration of the matter referred to, and then it introduces the first sentence which is founded upon in these Issues, by the following reference to a previous statement that had been made by his adversary, Amicus Veritatis. He says, 'Amicus Veritatis says, "Your correspondent might have been more sparing in his reproaches against the Catholics in Glasgow, for the manifestation of their piety and public spirit; and for raising a building which for ages to come will adorn and ornament our city." I have no objection that our city be ornamented with stately buildings by those who can afford to do it; but I would rather that all the houses in Glasgow were as plain as they were a hundred years ago, than that our poor population should be deprived of one necessary of life, in order to build palaces. I acquit myself of having reproached the Papists on this subject. I stated a plain fact, that while they were lavishing thousands of pounds on the decorations of what they foolishly call the house of God, they were suffering their poor to grow up and perish in ignorance. If they feel themselves reproached by this, it is the fact that does it, not I.

"I must read to you another passage which they have left out of their Issues, to show that Mr M'Gavin never objected to the design of erecting a new chapel to the Catholics; that he was no enemy to the pious design of providing to those poor Catholics a proper place of worship. For you will find in one of the very Numbers from which a charge is made, he expresses himself as strongly upon the subject, as Mr Scott himself could. It is the Number upon which the main stress of this case is laid; and they quote the first part of the paragraph, and then they leave out the intermediate sentence, which totally changes the matter. He says, 'In my last Number, I promised to give some examples to confirm what I wrote about money being extorted from poor persons, for the purpose of building the Popish chapel. I find no fault with the Romish sect for building a place of worship for themselves. They have legally as good a right to do so, as any other sect that is not established by law. Had they, of their own accord, agreed to erect a comfortable and commodious building; and had they contributed voluntarily, according to their ability, for the purpose, no reasonable man would have found fault, however much he might pity those who were so blinded by superstition, as to give their money for the support of a system which is inimical to their own happiness. Still, however, had it been a voluntary thing, they would have been acting like freeborn British subjects; and had they been content with a building merely comfortable and commodious, they would have shown themselves possessed of some measure of common sense.' Therefore, it was not upon that score that Mr M'Gavin ever made any attack upon the principles or practice of any of them.

"Having introduced the subject in this way, by alluding to the previous passage of Amicus Veritatis, this passage certainly occurs: 'But this is not all:—I ask A. V. if that house was not built, in a great measure, at the expense of a poor, and in some instances a starving people? I ask him if money was not extorted by the fear of future punishment, for the purpose of building that house, from persons who had scarcely bread for their families, or clothes to cover them? And is this what he calls the "piety and public spirit of the Catholics in Glasgow." The Almighty hates robbery for burnt-offering; and will he accept as honourable to him that which has been wrung from the sweat, and sinews, and blood, of his own miserable creatures? Let the means by which this house was reared be inscribed upon its front; and it will remain for 'ages to come,' a monument of Popish hard-heartedness and cruelty.'

"Then he goes on,—'Idolatry in every form is cruel. That Popery is idolatry, is clearly proved by Mr Cunningham of Lainshaw, in a late publication, which I strongly recommend to such of your readers as wish to know what that system really is. A. V. has discovered the spirit of idolatry in the letter which I am at present answering. He says, 'Were we to erect a house for the glory of our Creator, why should it not, as much as possible resemble the majesty of that God to whose service it was to be dedicated?' Now, what must that God be, to whose majesty any material building can be a resemblance? Certainly not that God who dwelleth not in temples made with hands, and whose glory fills the universe. It must be an idol of A. V.'s own fancy.'

"Can you, as an honest jury, in judging of this question, whether Mr M'Gavin wrote this intermediate passage maliciously; can you separate it from the context, the subject, the controversy, and its nature? It is impossible—you must read the whole together—for it is your duty to dive into the motives and views of Mr M'Gavin, in writing. You must judge whether he did it, bona fide, believing that he was maintaining a case of momentous importance. Beginning, as I explained to you he did, and forced to go on, you will judge whether he introduced that passage, bona fide, in the first place, believing it true, and in the next, that it was of vast importance in its tendency.

"You will see, that it had no allusion to Mr Scott. Gentlemen tell you, they cannot understand it could apply to any other person than to Mr Scott. In that passage, there was no allusion to Mr Scott, nor mention of the ghostly father; there had been no allusion to the clergyman and chapel, except as to what had been first said as to the place; and it could not mean that which my friend wishes you to think it means, imputation of an intentional crime committed by those persons.

"Those persons who have told you, it could not but refer to him; those were the very persons employed to collect the funds for this chapel, who have been examined. A great deal of money might have been extorted in that way, that Mr Scott never knew of. In this charge, there was no allusion made to Mr Scott; and if they had no other articles of charge against Mr M'Gavin, could they make out from that, that he could mean no other person than Mr Scott? Mr M'Gavin had not seen all those books in the manner you have seen them; he had not heard the instructions of which I shall speak afterwards. All he knew was, that vast sums of money had been raised, and raised, I shall show you, from a poor population, and, in many instances, from a starving population. That he knew by means which I state to you, but he knew no more; and I appeal to you, whether you can say, upon your oaths, that in writing that passage, he was actuated by malice towards Mr Scott.

"You were told, there is inconsistency in denying the statement, and saying it is true. There is no inconsistency. I say, that, in writing that statement, he did not allude to any one; he was speaking of a system, a principle which is at the bottom of their faith, and it was to that he was directing himself generally. Was there any inconsistency in this, and in making statements afterwards, which he believed to be true, and then offering to prove them?

"This letter was written on 26th June, 1818. Mr M'Gavin continued to go on in the controversy. Amicus Veritatis and Pax continued to write in a series of subsequent letters. Mr M'Gavin in one place says, 'Pax accuses me of trying, by reproaches, "to unsheath the sword; but it has long since rusted in its scabbard, and will not yield to the ungenerous tug." And he prophesies, that "in a little, it will be found rotted to the hilt." What sword does he mean? If it be the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God, I hope it will never be sheathed, that it will never rot, and that it will never cease to be wielded by the friends of truth, so long as error exists in the world. If he mean the sword of persecution, and that I try to unsheath it, he slanders his neighbour, and lays himself open to more severe reproof than I choose to administer. I have no hostility against him; I pity him as the unhappy victim of error and imposition; and the worst thing I wish him is, that he would be convinced of his errors, and renounce them. But I declare the most determined hostility against the whole system of Popery; not against Papists, but against their errors, which are their own greatest enemies. Like Mr Cunningham of Lainshaw, to whose work on this subject I referred in my last, I believe it is not in the power of the devil to invent such another system of delusion, and wickedness, and opposition to the religion of Christ. This was the mightiest effort of the wicked one, to deprive the world of the benefit of Christ's incarnation and death, and to keep the human race in bondage to himself. He has been deplorably successful; and the ruin of millions of souls has been the consequence. It is because I wish well to the persons of Papists—it is because I wish nothing less than their present and everlasting happiness, that I wish them delivered from the bondage of error, and the dominion of their priests,—and that the priests themselves were delivered from the slavery of the prince of darkness.'

"And in that letter, he makes his statement, to which I call your particular attention. There is a question you know has been a good deal agitated, whether the statutory disabilities affecting the Roman Catholics should be repealed. There is great difference of opinion on the subject, and we know that those who are of opinion those disabilities should continue, have never ceased, and have never hesitated to make the most direct attacks, upon the whole principles and practice of the Roman Catholics, down to the present day, and you never heard that employing the strongest language against them was a ground for damages. In that case, you would have had claims of damages enough.

"At this time, Mr M'Gavin had adopted what is called the liberal opinion, and it was in favour of the Catholics on that subject. He says, 'I consider every species of civil disability and disqualification on a religious account, persecution; and I am sorry that in this otherwise free and happy country, so many are subjected to it, and the Papists among the rest. Persecution is disgraceful to those who inflict, but honourable to those who suffer it. It throws around them the charm and glory of a relationship to apostles, and prophets, and men of whom the world was not worthy. Popery is not worthy of such honour. I would never persecute Papists.'

"He was of opinion that the disabilities ought to be abolished, not because he thought the principles and practice of the Papists of the present day were not grievously erroneous,—because, holding the faith he held, he must have believed, and must still believe, that every error of that kind is destructive to the individual who holds it,—certainly, without believing there could be no good men and Christians among Catholics,—but that such opinions are dangerous to them, he, and every Protestant must believe.

"In this letter Mr M'Gavin stated he was a subscriber to the Catholic schools. So far he bore them no malice. He was giving his means for the benefit of those very schools, for the benefit of which the Oratorio had been held in the chapel. He says, 'Nobody can hinder them from continuing Papists if they please; and even in this case, I wish to do them good. I wish to see them all well educated, and respectable members of society. I have, therefore, been a subscriber to their schools, and intend to remain so. Whatever creed they shall profess, it is better to have a reading, well informed, than an ignorant population. While, therefore, I intend to continue the controversy with my two opponents, I hope none will accuse me of hostility to the Catholic schools; and I hope the exposure which I have made, or may yet make of the errors of Popery, will not induce any to withdraw their support. The worse the system is, there is the more need that the people be instructed in the art of reading, that they may have access to the source of knowledge, and be able to judge for themselves.'

"Those two writers, Amicus Veritatis and Pax, raised various other subjects of controversy, and one of them was this—they attacked the much celebrated, and hitherto believed to be pious, Luther. They accused him of the foulest crimes, and I shall show you, that some of them (officious friends no doubt, and I do not accuse Mr Scott) some of them circulated, along with charges against Mr M'Gavin, charges against Luther, Calvin, Melancthon, and others, of adultery, forgery, encouragement of adultery, every thing in short that was calculated to excite and provoke all the feelings of indignation, of which Mr M'Gavin was possessed, from the knowledge he had, and the information he had, of the authors of the Reformation.

"This correspondence went on, till Mr M'Gavin saw he could not treat his subject at sufficient length in the Newspaper; and he determined on the beginning of a periodical work called The Protestant, for the purpose of refuting the statements that had been made in favour of the Catholic faith, and of endeavouring to defend the Protestant faith. There were, accordingly, various subjects brought into notice, besides those I have mentioned. Transubstantiation was treated at great length; the infallibility of the Pope, and that matter as to the charge against Luther, was brought on the board.

"In the second Number of that work, Mr M'Gavin had occasion to detect a very gross misrepresentation which had been made by one of those writers; nothing less than charging Luther with the offence of encouraging adultery, which he made by pretending to quote Luther's own words, putting a point where there ought to be a comma, and leaving out a part of the sentence, which was necessary to the understanding of his meaning. Mr M'Gavin says, 'I shall give the whole sentence as it stands in Luther, that the reader may see how much he has been abused by modern Papists. 'Si domina nolit, adveniat ancilla, ita tamen ut antea iterum et tertium uxorem admoneat maritus, et coram aliis ejus etiam pertinaciam detegat, ut publice et ante conspectum Ecclesiæ duritia ejus et agnoscatur et reprehendatur.' This is a part of Luther's third reason of divorce. He is maintaining that, in certain circumstances, it is lawful for a man to put away his wife and take another,—'yet so that before this, the husband admonish his wife, not only once, but a second, and a third time, and also expose her obstinacy before others, that publicly, and in presence of the church, her obstinacy may be known and reprehended.' But A. V. stops at the word ancilla: for a comma he substitutes a period, and omits all the rest of the sentence, which makes Luther appear to teach, that without ceremony, a man may take his handmaid instead of his wife." "The third reason of divorce is, when one party withdraws from the other, and will not perform due benevolence, or refuses to dwell with the other: in this case a husband may tell his wife that he will take another, but not privately, or on his own authority; but repeated admonition must be given to her before the church, as Luther's words are literally translated at the bottom of the second page; that is, she must be divorced before the husband is warranted to put her away,—or, in other words, that a regular process of divorce must be led before he can marry another. I see nothing in this contrary to the word of God, and I believe it is perfectly consistent with the law both in England and Scotland."

"I take notice of that, because it was immediately upon that letter appearing that Mr Scott came forward. The second Number of The Protestant was published on the 25th of July, 1818; and it was upon the 31st of July that Mr Scott for the first time, thought he was attacked in the passage founded upon in the first Issue, and which I read to you a little while ago. Upon the 31st of July, and not till then, did he think himself attacked. The letter complained of had been published in the Chronicle on the 2d of July. It was republished in The Protestant in the first Number, and no notice was taken of it. It had not occurred to Mr Scott there was any thing against him, nor for so long a time did he ask if he was alluded to. You will find in the ninth Number his letter on the subject. It is at page 61st of the first Vol.—'To the Editor of The Glasgow Chronicle.—Sir,—From your Paper of Thursday, the 2d of July current, I quote the following paragraph from a letter addressed to you, as Editor, under the signature of 'A Protestant:'—

"But this is not all:—I ask A. V. if that house" (meaning the new Catholic chapel) "was not built in a great measure, at the expense of a poor, and in some instances, a starving people? I ask him if money was not extorted by the fear of future punishment, for the purpose of building that house, from persons who had scarcely bread for their families, or clothes to cover them? And is this what he calls the 'piety and public spirit of the Catholics of Glasgow?' The Almighty hates robbery for burnt-offering; and will he accept, as honouring to him, that which has been wrung from the sweat, and sinews, and blood, of his own miserable creatures? Let the means by which this house was reared be inscribed upon its front, and it will remain, for 'ages to come,' a monument of Popish hard-heartedness and cruelty.

"It is well known to the public, and to the people of Glasgow in particular, that it was I who took the active management and superintendence in forwarding the new Catholic chapel, and obtaining subscriptions and money for it. From this circumstance it has occurred to many, that the paragraph above quoted pointed at and referred to me; but I have no means, in the first instance, of ascertaining the truth of this, or the intentions of the writer, except by an application to you. I have therefore to request that you favour me with the real name and address of the author of the letter, or that he, through you, explicitly state whether he meant or referred to me, as the person who had extorted money by the fear of future punishment, for the purpose of building the Catholic chapel, from persons who had scarcely bread for their families, or clothes to cover them.

"It was some time after the letter referred to appeared in your paper before I saw it, and still longer before I heard it applied to me, or I would have made this communication sooner. —I am, Sir your most obedient servant,

(Signed) 'ANDREW SCOTT.

'6, Dunlop Street,
Glasgow, July 31, 1818.'

"First, it was some time published before he heard of the letter. You will judge of the probability of that, considering the publicity with which the controversy had been going on. And, after he did see it, Mr Scott himself says, that it was some time longer before he heard it applied to him. Mr Scott himself was not aware that it applied to him. Then with what face can Mr Scott say, that every person who looked at the passage must have known that it applied to him and to no other mortal? I submit to you, it is conclusive upon that subject, that he did not so apply it, and that it is not the natural inference. Besides it was some time, by his own admission four weeks, before any friend had said to him that it applied to him. I apprehend those who have sworn today, it could have no other meaning, must have seen it, and yet they never thought of applying it so at that time.

"Upon being told to apply to Mr M'Gavin, he writes to him and requests the favour of an answer to his inquiry. My friend, Mr Cockburn, said, that when this was fairly put to Mr M'Gavin, he shuffled, and that he must have known in his heart that he was doing wrong. But there was no shuffling. Mr M'Gavin says, —'Rev. Sir, I have received your letter of yesterday's date, with a copy of your correspondence with the Editor of the Glasgow Chronicle; in reply to which I have only to say, that if you, or any of your flock, feel injured or misrepresented by any thing published in that paper by 'A Protestant,' the press is as open to you and them as it is to me. If you write a reply to the paragraph which you have quoted, I shall, if you please, give it a place in an early Number of The Protestant.—I am, your most obedient servant.

'37, Virginia Street,
August 1, 1818.
'REV. ANDREW SCOTT.'

"I ask what could a man do more than that, except Mr Scott had expected my client to say, I abandon all the controversy and contradict all I have said about the building of your chapel? He could not say more than that he would publish an answer in his very paper. I say that was fair, and no shuffling. Mr M'Gavin, it seems, shuffles, because he would not say he applied what he had said to Mr Scott. He applied it to no man. It was a general fact,—and that was the answer Mr M'Gavin made.

"Then there was another letter from Scott, in which he says,—'Sir,—Your letter of the 1st instant is no answer to mine of the 31st July, containing a copy of the correspondence which accompanied it. I asked no answer or explanations for my flock: it was for myself as an individual; and the only question was, whether you meant and alluded to me in the paragraph of the letter referred to? In that paragraph I did, and do still, consider myself particularly pointed at. I was no party to, nor any way concerned with, the publication of any of the letters that appeared in the Chron- icle. I never saw them till I read them in that paper; and I consider it due to myself and to the situation which I fill, to require an explanation from the author of the paragraph I quoted. I therefore still expect that your honour and character as a gentleman will convince you of the propriety of giving a direct answer to my query, viz. Whether or not you alluded to me in the paragraph referred to?'

"He did not say in a former letter it applied to him. I do in my conscience believe the main purpose of writing was that Mr M'Gavin should make it public, and for the reason that in Number second, which immediately preceded, he had detected gross misrepresentations as to Luther, which would have been highly discreditable in Mr Scott, who would therefore naturally wish to put an end to any doubt of the possibility of his having written that passage.

"Something was said as to Mr M'Gavin having garbled his correspondence. I do not know what is meant. The letters are printed at length. Mr M'Gavin says, 'To the above I replied in a few words, that I had no private answer to Mr Scott farther than I had already given.' That was his whole note.

"It is said, Why not give a private answer? I answer, Mr M'Gavin saw that the intention was to convert that which had been a public controversy between him and two anonymous writers into a personal altercation between him and Mr Scott. He did not wish to put it upon that footing. He had not published any thing against Mr Scott personally. If any thing applied against him, the fault was not that of Mr M'Gavin. The answer he gives is, 'Mr M'Gavin has no private answer to Mr Scott farther than he has already given.'

"He went on in the second Number. He did not stop on receiving the letter. He was in the middle of a discussion which he did not choose to break. He went on till he came to the eighth Number, which is that containing the letters. It is curious that even that eighth Number does not relate to Mr Scott nor to his chapel at all,—Mr M'Gavin was so full of his general subject. It begins, 'In my last Number I said it was very uncertain whether the apostle Peter had ever been at Rome. I do not say it is certain he never was there; for I admit there is a very early tradition of his having been in that city. It is however merely tradition; and no man is under any obligation to believe it. If it had even the authority of authentic history,—if it were a fact as well established as the murder of Julius Cæsar by Brutus, which it is not,—it would still be a matter of mere history, and not the subject of faith in a religious sense. I should believe it just as I believe the fact of Cæsar's murder; but rest no religious principle or practice upon it.

"'The bible is sufficient for every purpose of Christian faith and practice; and what I find not written in the sacred volume, however true it may be as a matter of history, or however plausible as a speculative opinion, I hold it of no account whatever in determining any point in religion,' &c.

"And then he says,—'I have said much more on this subject than was necessary in merely replying to the letter of Pax; but, as I had my hand in the work, I thought a few hours could not be employed to better purpose than in giving a short sketch of the arrogant claims of the Romish Church, and of the arguments by which they are supported. This is a subject deeply interesting at the present time,' &c. &c.

"And then he says,—'It does not at present occur to me that I have any more to say in reply to Pax. I think I have answered every thing in his letters that required an answer, that is, almost every sentence of them. I have, however, a great deal of work before me in performing the like duty towards Amicus Veritatis, whose letters in the Glasgow Chronicle are almost as full of errors and misrepresentations as of sentences. I expect these letters, along with my own, will be republished in a few days, after which the reader will have it in his power to form a better judgment of my reply. In the mean time, I shall indulge myself and the reader with a little miscellaneous matter.'

"And then he publishes the letters. He says,—'The first week after the publication of my second Number, which contained my exposure of the Popish imposition in the matter of Luther, the Rev. Mr Scott addressed a letter to the Editor of the Glasgow Chronicle, requiring my name and address, which having been communicated, he sent me a copy of the said letter, with one addressed to myself. I expect he will thank me for giving these letters publicity, as they seem evidently intended for the public eye; and I should have done them this honour sooner, had I not been unwilling to break the connection of more important matter.'

"Then he gives the letters, and he says,—'And now, since I am before the public, I will give him the answer which I did not choose to give privately:—I did not point at him as the person who was exclusively employed in the work of extorting money from the poor. I did not know how many agents were engaged weekly in that pious undertaking. I do not know whether Mr Scott be the only priest that officiated while the chapel was building, or whether he be the only one that officiates in it at present. The house that is building immediately west of the chapel, and which is, it is said, intended for the manse, will be large enough to accommodate a dozen of priests, while they remain unmarried, as they must always do; from which I infer that he either has, or intends to have, abundant assistance in milking and managing his flock.'

"You see how Mr M'Gavin was drawn on. He had published nothing but two lines in the middle of a letter, alluding to Mr Scott, till he comes down to the eighth Number—there is the distance of time from the 26th June to the 18th of September. Three months he had not written a single word about Mr Scott, nor about his chapel, and all that time the thing had been acquiesced in—and now he inserts those letters, and at the end he says, 'He did not point at Mr Scott as the person who was exclusively employed in the work of extorting money from the poor.' It was a possibility he might have been concerned, but Mr M'Gavin never said so, nor did he mean it. He levelled it against no individual, but made the remark generally.

"No doubt, in the next Number, the ninth, he goes on to make a statement of particular cases. I mention that the whole of the paper is exceedingly garbled indeed, by the manner in which it appears in those Issues—for there are a great many long paragraphs and passages which explain away the meaning, and most of all do away the idea of personal malice against any individual whatever.

"It begins in this manner:—'If it be not true, that "money was extorted for building the Popish chapel, by the fear of future punishment, from persons who had scarcely bread for their families, or clothes to cover them," why is it neither Mr Scott, nor any of his people, have publicly denied the charges insinuated in the obnoxious paragraph, which he has quoted from my letter? If it be not true, I should like to see it publicly disclaimed; and if any one had sent me a disavowal, duly authenticated, I should have given it publicity. But, in fact, the thing is too notorious to be denied. It is not a thing of a thousand miles' distance, or a hundred years old, else, I doubt not, it would be publicly and unanimously disavowed by all Papists, and every document produced to prove it would be pronounced a forgery.'

"I think that was a very reasonable remark. That matter had stood three months before the public—for neither Amicus Veritatis nor Pax said a word upon the subject.

"My friend, Mr Cockburn, says, Mr M'Gavin concealed the private contradiction Mr Scott had afforded him. Mr Scott did not contradict it in any manner—he did not deny it—he inquires whether it was pointed at him, implying it might be true though not pointed at him — and Mr M'Gavin begins No. IX. under the impression produced by their own conduct. For three months it stood uncontradicted.

"Was Mr M'Gavin entitled, or not, to believe there was some reality in what was said, when he found himself so left without receiving contradiction? It confirmed what impressions he had before.

"Then he had other information,—and he goes on to state that, 'The chapel must have cost as much money as would have built three comfortable houses sufficiently large. It is well known that the bulk of the adherents of the Romish Church here are poor labouring people; and it is not denied that the necessary funds, with the exception of a small sum from some very liberal Protestants, were raised among the people themselves. There was a sort of poll-tax imposed upon the members, according to their real or supposed circumstances.' The Issues stop at that word 'circumstances,' but the book goes on. 'This tax was levied with no small rigour; and, during a period of great commercial distress, it must undoubtedly have pressed heavily upon many poor persons, who were not left the choice of giving or not giving, but who were taught that nothing less than the salvation of their souls depended upon their paying the tax. Some who were actually exempted from the king's cottage tax, on account of their extreme poverty, were paying four times as much for building the chapel.'

"Then there was another long paragraph not inserted—and then there is the paragraph which I read: 'I find no fault with the Romish sect for building a place of worship for themselves. They have legally as good a right to do so as any other sect that is not established by law. Had they, of their own accord, agreed to erect a comfortable and commodious building, and had they contributed voluntarily, according to their ability, for the purpose, no reasonable man would have found fault, however much he might pity those who were so blinded by superstition, as to give their money for the support of a system which is inimical to their own happiness. Still, however, had it been a voluntary thing, they would have been acting like free-born British subjects; and had they been content with a building merely comfortable and commodious, they would have shown themselves possessed of some measure of common sense. But, as I shall show presently, there was a heavy tax imposed upon the people without their consent; and all who submitted to this became, in fact, the vassals or slaves of their tax-masters. They stood no longer on the high and independent ground which every British subject is entitled to occupy: their property, the hard-earned fruit of their labour, was at the arbitrary disposal of persons over whom they had no control, and who would not deign to consult them with regard to its application.

"'Besides nothing less it seems would suffice to gratify the vanity of him, or them, who had the charge of the money so extorted from the people, than a splendid edifice, equal at least to some ancient cathedral; or, to use the words of Amicus Veritatis, a house resembling, "as much as possible, the majesty of that God to whose service it was to be dedicated." I need not stop at present to show that this could not be a place intended for Christian worship; for it must be only an idol that can find a likeness or resemblance in wood and stone, carved according to the art of the craftsmen. My present business is with the enormous expense of this building; and I not hesitate to repeat as an assertion, what I formerly put as a question, Whether it was not built, in a great measure, at the expense of a poor, and in some instances, of a starving people? I go upon the supposition, that what was levied under the pretext of building the chapel, was actually applied to that object; for that is what many of the contributors themselves must take for granted.' And then he says, 'And so far as I know, no doubt exists with regard to the faithfulness of the application.

"'Now it is a fact, that while the chapel was a building, the people, while they yet met in their old place of worship, were assured by their ghostly father—(this phrase is not used as a term of reproach. Ghostly is the old English word for spiritual; and, according to the Douay Catechism, ghostly father is the title by which the clergy choose to be called)—that such of them as fell behind in their payments, should not enjoy church privileges. What was this, but extorting money by the fear of future punishment? and, from the condition of many of those from whom it was so extorted, who can doubt that often they had scarcely food for their families, or clothes to cover them? Every one knows in what estimation Papists regard the privileges of their church. To be denied these, is the same as to be denied the salvation of their souls: the poor, therefore, were told, in language sufficiently plain, that if the chapel tax was not punctually paid, they should suffer the pains of purgatory, or even hell itself.'

"But I shall not fatigue you by reading the passages in the Issues, which have been frequently read.

"My learned friend read also a passage on the top of page 70, and stopt also in the middle of it:—'The Church of Rome cherishes such ideas of baptism, and of the absolute necessity of it, in order to the salvation of children; yet there was a priest in Glasgow, who would not baptize a child because its father was a few shillings in arrears of an arbitrarily imposed tax. Upon his own principles, the priest was, for the sake of a few shillings, guilty of the everlasting perdition of that child. The soul of one child is more precious than a thousand worlds; but Popery cares not how many thousand souls shall perish, if it can but gratify its own avarice and ambition.

"'Most sincerely do I wish that all Papists, and especially all fathers and mothers, would forsake their priests and come to Christ, the friend of sinners and the friend of children. If they believe in him they shall receive all heavenly blessings for themselves; and as for their children, they shall find that he imposes no such conditions, with regard to their salvation, as the hard-hearted priests impose. Such priests care for neither parents nor children, farther than as they can extort money from them. They will let them perish, if they cannot pay for their salvation; but Christ has a tender and compassionate heart. He has set open the door of mercy, that whosoever will may enter in and enjoy all the blessings of salvation, without money and without price. He has not made baptism, nor any thing else that man can do, necessary to the salvation of children. His own righteousness is sufficient to present them, as well as their believing parents, without spot before the throne of God.'

"There is an earnestness in the introduction of such statements, which makes it utterly impossible for any man, acquainted with such subjects, to suppose the passages written from private malice, unless he believes the author to have been the greatest hypocrite that ever existed,—and Mr M'Gavin we shall prove to have such a character as to save him from such suspicion. He so writes in the middle of the offences charged against him in this ninth Number, having in his mind the deep importance of the general subject. You see this,—and that he began from the first by accident, and went on with the sincerity of a man truly impressed with the subject, putting away all minor considerations, and not weighing all the words in illustration which he introduced. In the instances referred to, he asserts that sort of compulsion which proceeds from the principles of the Roman Catholics;—and how far we shall prove the cases, it will be for you to consider.

"But now I must beg your attention very particularly to this passage:—'I have more facts at the service of Mr Scott, if he shall think these insufficient to confirm my assertion. But I shall conclude this Number by asking him some questions, to which I hope he will write an answer; and if he does so, I will readily give it a place in The Protestant. Indeed it is my earnest desire, that he would defend himself and his cause; for that is in danger of becoming a tame controversy that is all on one side. I ask Mr Scott, whether he did not, on a certain day, denounce some of his people by name, before his whole congregation, for falling behind in the weekly impost?—if he did not pronounce very awful curses against the unhappy individuals, and threaten to consign their souls to everlasting punishment, if the money was not paid?—I ask if he did not refer to others, besides those whom he named, as also in arrears, and threaten them with similar judgment if they did not speedily pay? I request Mr Scott to answer these questions; and say whether or not such anathemas have proceeded from his lips, and whether he thinks cursing his people be the duty of a minister of the gospel of peace ?'

"This was published in the Number of the 12th of September, 1818. My friend, in his statement, passed over at once what it is important to notice. He said the matter lay over for fourteen months. But I ask you what is the inference ? That very argument in the ninth Number lay unanswered. That subject lay without the smallest interference for fourteen months. Mr Scott had written to Mr M'Gavin, desiring to know whether the assertions were directed against him — and Mr M'Gavin had given the public the only answer he had thought proper to give, that he did not intend to point at Mr Scott exclusively,—but still he went on to state the grounds upon which he had made the statement, and asserted he believed the statement true.

"In one of those papers he says, 'I shall proceed to give a few more facts on this subject. The reader may rely on their authenticity. I could indeed give the names of the parties concerned ; but I do not choose to do so, unless I shall be judicially called upon. I have been informed that some of my Papist neighbours talk big about my having libelled them ; they even speak of a legal prosecution against me, for what I have written on the subject of their extorting money from the poor ; and they will compel me, they say, to answer Mr Scott's question, whether or not I referred to him as the person who did so ? I have no doubt the Papists of the present day are very willing to employ the old Popish argument of fines and imprisonments, and worse, if they could, against all whom they cannot otherwise confute ; and if they had the inquisition at command, they would no doubt silence me. It seems there is no resource left them, but to appeal to some criminal tribunal ; for they find that arguments and facts are all against them. It is my happiness, however, to live in a country in which there is no inquisition ; and therefore I shall, without fear, produce my facts, as I have hitherto done my arguments, leaving the reader to judge how far my assertions are proved by them.'

"I beg your attention to the language in that passage. Observe that was in September, 1818. Mr M'Gavin holds out a bold challenge to his opponents to come forward. He had been told of certain facts—and he says, when I am called upon judicially I shall give the names of the parties concerned.

"Fourteen months elapsed without any notice of those pretended libels. To those fourteen months I may take the liberty of adding seven or eight more, which elapsed before any action was brought. I know the pretence upon which this is attempted to be justified. But observe the effect this delay had upon this trial. This population—this Irish Catholic population in Glasgow, is migrating—is continually changing,—and many, who were then resident in Glasgow, are no longer in Scotland—the persons from whom Mr M'Gavin had his information in September, 1818, are now gone beyond his reach—and those persons were under the pastoral influence of Mr Scott himself, and the influence of all the office-bearers in that church —they were the labourers who had paid their money in that manner, and were gone before Mr Scott found it convenient to institute his action.

"The first thing Mr M'Gavin did, was to state the very particulars of the information which he had received, without giving the names of the parties ;—and he stated, that when called upon judicially, he would name the persons, and would be prepared for his defence. Then his opponents allowed a long time (nearly two years) to elapse, till the witnesses were gone—and of those who remained, their memory failed them in many instances, as might have been expected. Then the pursuer found it convenient to bring this action.

"You cannot dispossess yourselves of that fact. We are told, the delay was a proof of the pursuer's indulgence,—that he was unwilling to bring the matter into a court of justice. That will not do. He began by writing to demand an answer to his question, whether he was pointed at in the paragraph which he quoted—and they tell you, the answer was direct —that it was imputing to him the charges in that paragraph. If so, then how can Mr Scott pretend, that, after being so defied, the subsequent delay was mere indulgence, and proceeded from liberality, in his being unwilling to bring Mr M'Gavin before a court of law.

"When you thus see, then, the nature of this advantage of the pursuer,—his undue advantage over us as to the question of fact,—you will properly give effect to such a remarkable circumstance.

"About the end of the fourteen months, a circumstance occurred, not imputable to Mr M'Gavin, which renewed the subject for a little. You remember, that, during the whole interval, from September, 1818, to the month of November, 1819, Mr M'Gavin had been publishing weekly, a Number of The Protestant. He had been going on upon the general subject of the Catholic religion ; clearly showing that he did not write that book from malice to Mr Scott, but was occupied with a far deeper matter of importance to himself. After his challenge, he went on with his general subject, thinking little of Mr Scott or his chapel. He went on with The Protestant, a work which does high honour to his talents and his knowledge of the subject.

"You see, upon the face of the Issues, that a letter was addressed to him from a respectable person, who says,—'Glasgow Town's Hospital, September, 1819.' (The learned counsel read Mr Sym's letter, which need not be repeated here. It may be seen in the Issues, page 6th of this Report.)

"They have not pretended that Mr M'Gavin had the smallest concern either with the preparation of that statement, or with the inquiry which had been instituted by the committee of the Town's Hospital. The committee had made the inquiry, and, unasked, they send him this statement as to this particular instance. Mr M'Gavin has an interest in the Hospital, as a contributor to its funds, which are raised by assessment on the citizens of Glasgow. He received that letter after fourteen months' acquiescence by Mr Scott in his previous statements; and it was of such a nature, that it was his duty, treating as he was of such subjects, to lay it before the public, and he did so, as would appear from the 9th page of the Issues. And it came to his knowledge that the 8s. had been restored, and which has been admitted this day.

"What followed upon this publication? Was all the indulgence, the kindliness of Mr Scott, at once done away? And did he come forward directly to accuse my client with having made a false accusation against him? No. That was published in the 72d Number, on the 27th of November, 1819, and there was no action raised until the month of May, 1820.

"Thus, after having acquiesced for fourteen months in the previous statements, he now let this stand for six months more, without either making a contradiction of it, or bringing his action. After all that time had elapsed, he brings his action.

"In the meantime, soon after the publication of the ninth Number of The Protestant, in 1818, a work was set on foot, which was called The Catholic Vindicator. That Catholic Vindicator is admitted to have been published under the direction of a committee of persons belonging to the congregation of Mr Scott, by a person of the name of Andrews; and in it, every possible term of reproach which the English language could furnish, was raked together to assail the personal character of Mr M'Gavin. He was denounced as a shuffling, profligate, and lying opponent. He was called a convicted forger, a defender of adultery, and protector of an adulterous strumpet. As such he was actually placarded on the corners of the streets, under the direction of a committee belonging to Mr Scott's congregation, as you may see by these handbills, which some of pursuer's witnesses have authenticated. The reproach of being a favourer of adultery was applied to Luther at first; but my client was put upon the same footing. He was, besides, termed a forger,—a retailer of falsehood,—and it was said, his authorities were not a tittle better than himself.

"I am not imputing this to Mr Scott."

Lord GILLIES—"And therefore, I think, we have nothing to do with it."

Mr MONCREIFF—"I shall read an extract or two.—'The Protestant may endeavour to represent this affair as "of no importance whatever" to the question before us; but the reflecting reader will not be put off by such shufflings. In all cases of accusation, the character of the accuser must be taken into consideration; and if he and his witnesses are found to contradict each other; if he is detected in forging evidence to convict the accused, every sensible man will conclude, that his cause is a bad one, by his having recourse to such base means to support it; and that the system which he attacks is not so vile as he makes it, or more honest means would be resorted to by him to justify his charges. The man who has the vindication of true religion at heart, will never ally himself to falsehood; but the wretch who seeks to blacken his neighbour's character, from motives of malice or revenge, or any other bad passion of the mind, will employ any means to gratify his wicked propensities, and thus dig a snare for his own feet. Into such a snare has The Protestant tumbled himself; and, in the words of our courts of justice, I say, "God send him a good deliverance."' But I need not go through all such passages. I merely mention them to draw my inference to you—to let you see the progress of the controversy—and how Mr M'Gavin was provoked to it. He was provoked by others, who came forward to supply the places of Amicus Veritatis and Pax, and to carry on the controversy with a still more unmeasured hostility. You see by the affidavit of Andrews, that he was solicited by persons of Mr Scott's congregation to write against Mr M'Gavin; and that these persons became bound to him for the expense of publication, and took the charge of circulating the work.

"But, I must state, it is not by any means clear Mr Scott is free from responsibility in the matter—for he did, within his chapel, recommend to many of his congregation to purchase up that work. This admits of two constructions. One is, that it had sold badly; and that was just attaching himself to it as a thing that had been set on foot for his interest. And if he disapproved of it, it was that it was making attacks on my client which would not stand inquiry. Notwithstanding he could not be rendered liable directly as author and publisher, he was thus responsible. He was giving his sanction to the propagation of the most odious calumnies against Mr M'Gavin's personal character.

"Of all those attacks, Mr M'Gavin took no notice but in argument. And, when he published the statement sent him by Mr Sym, I submit to you whether he did publish that statement maliciously. Was he not in bona fide? If that was not feasible ground on which he proceeded, where could a man find it? It will be for Mr Sym to point out the nature of the information he received, and we shall see how far it has been proved that the statements were true.

"My friend, Mr Cockburn, says, we are not entitled to enter into this,—but that is altogether a mistake. We have not a special Issue here—but we have a title to show Mr M'Gavin had reasonable ground,—that you may know whether he did maliciously act or not—and to enable you to estimate correctly, and with propriety, the claim of damages. And therefore, we shall be entitled to enter into that question, —and you will find the substance of the statement is perfectly true.

"A story was given by my friend, about the husband of this Mrs Hanlin, of which we never heard before. He has not proved a word of it. In point of fact, the thing happened substantially as Sym stated it—for, if there was not sufficient information, Mr M'Gavin had received such reasonable information as entitled him to believe that the statement which he published was true.

"The work of The Protestant (I do not know that it is finished yet) was continued from laudable motives. The profits had been applied to purposes of charity—and Mr M'Gavin had bestowed his time and labour on the work, chiefly with a view to the interest of the subject, and to his earnest desire to make his argument as ample as possible.

"Mr M'Gavin paid over £150 to charitable purposes (and great part of it went to Irish Catholics) before any action was instituted—and you are to judge whether this was a person who wrote for mercenary purposes, or who sat down deliberately to destroy the peace of his neighbour, from no other motive than malice. From the history I have given of The Protestant,—it proceeded originally from accident,—it was forced on by the attacks of others,—it continued without any allusion to Mr Scott, until he obtruded himself on Mr M'Gavin by his letters.

"Now, having come to the raising of the action, I must take notice of the view which my friend finds it convenient to give of that of which he says my client accused Mr Scott. He says, we are accusing him of an indictable offence,—and, he says, why did we not resort to a public court of justice?

"This is an entire misconception of the case and of the controversy; and, had the offence charged been such as my friend alleges, it had rested with the public prosecutor, not with Mr M'Gavin, to bring Mr Scott to account.

"My friend says, it is a question of private calumny. It is so. But if you can bring your minds to say, it is a case of private calumny—if you can bring your minds to say, you can infer malignity here,—I should be much astonished. I cannot believe it is a result to which you will ever come.

"To say we accuse Mr Scott of an indictable offence, and should apply to a court of justice, is absurd. For Mr M'Gavin never did impute to Mr Scott, or any body else, any thing that could be construed into a charge of that description. And that leads me to explain Mr M'Gavin's views connected with all the details of his argument.

"It is a doctrine of the Catholic Church, according to the first authorities at the time of the Reformation, that not only edifices for public worship were sacred, but that there was positive merit on the one hand,—merit for the salvation of their souls,—in contributing to their utmost possible means to the pious purpose of erecting such magnificent edifices; and that, on the other, there was demerit, to the peril of their souls, in refusing so to contribute when the work had been set agoing,—or even when there is a design of making such erection,—and the priest has enjoined that they should contribute.

"It was no invention of Mr M'Gavin's—it was no imputation on Mr Scott, to say that he believes in that doctrine, as one of his own church,—still less was it to say, that the poor people under his charge must be influenced by his directions,—and that, therefore, when such a thing had been enjoined on them, they would have, to the utmost extent of the means in their hands, so employed them, instead of employing them to the support of their families,—and that they would have entertained the greatest dread if they did not so contribute after such injunctions from the priest.

"I am not going to detain you with a dissertation on this subject; but I shall read two sentences from Cardinal Bellarmine, with reference to the case of the widow's mite. That it is erroneous, every one of you will perceive: —'The widow,' &c."

[The words were not taken down as they were read; but the purport of them was, that it is the duty of Christians, however poor, to devote their last farthing for the glory of God, as the poor widow did; and that it is not only a duty paramount to all others, but it is peculiarly meritorious to contribute our last mite for building churches to God's glory.]

"There is," said Mr Moncreiff, "one side of the proposition. It is a Christian duty, and it is meritorious in the sight of God, and contributes to the salvation of the soul, for persons, however poor, to give their last farthing for the building of churches. Then, on the other side, there is the demerit of neglecting to do it. The Protestants urge against them the passage in Matthew, where it is said, those who do not feed the poor should be condemned. In answer to that, Bellarmine says, 'The less sinners are,' &c."

[Here again the Reporter does not give the passage verbatim; but it was to this effect:—the less sinners are those who do not feed the poor, and do other acts of charity; and the great sinners, or the greatest of all sinners, are those who do not contribute for the building of churches.]

"There is the Catholic doctrine of Bellarmine. And do you put yourselves in the case of Mr M'Gavin for an instant, with the belief, that that is the doctrine maintained by them, and see what is the doctrine maintained by him. What he says is,—you Catholics hold this tenet, that there is merit in the building of a church,—that you must not refuse your aid to the last mite, like the widow in the passage referred to. Now, he saw around him thousands of poor Irish labourers, requiring charity to enable them to live at that period—and he saw the most magnificent building, that had been seen in Scotland, erecting in Glasgow, and erected, as I shall show you, with the twopences and threepences of those poor labourers.

Now, how could any man reason upon this case without reasoning in this way? They are taught to believe, by their ghostly or spiritual father, that they must contribute to the chapel,—nay taught, as they must have been by their fathers, to believe all the doctrines of the Catholic Church, was he not entitled to assume they believed this also? And he was told they did contribute to this chapel, and collectors were set over every cotton and other public work in Glasgow, that they should receive the contributions. If he saw that, how could he but believe those men acted on the compulsion of the mind, which is more strong than any other compulsion? They believed what all their spiritual fathers had been always inculcating, and it was impossible Mr M'Gavin could have judged otherwise.

"They tell us it was a voluntary contribution. This is true in one sense. In this land of freedom, Mr Scott could not have forced them, if they were unwilling to pay. In that sense, Mr M'Gavin never did say they were forced to pay. What he said was, and he says it still,—that, under the influence of their religion, and the belief they were doing God service and saving their souls, they were called to contribute under intellectual compulsion.

"Those men (those of the collectors who were examined to-day) tell us, they asked what a man would contribute—but they know, at the same time, that such is a Papist's faith, it is his indispensable duty, as he values his soul, to pay contributions for such a purpose.

"Such is the true, just, and clear view of the case. What Mr M'Gavin reasoned against was, that destructive doctrine, (as I can say to you,) that destructive doctrine of the imagination, that, by the paltry exercise of contributing to the erection of a fine chapel, they were to save themselves from perdition, to which, we know, all mankind are doomed, unless redeemed by sovereign grace. It was against that perilous doctrine he was writing. It is there he brings to the test the point, that those men had been compelled to contribute to this object, under the persuasion they were otherwise endangering their immortal souls.

"I know there is another part of the charge, relating to the refusal of church privileges—but I thought it right, at first, to refer to what I have stated.

"When this action was raised, my client was beset with difficulties. The nature of the population being migratory, a great many were gone who could have proved the facts.

"And, on the other side, are any of you ignorant that, in the Roman Catholic church, there is an influence, a silent influence, of the priest over the people, that goes far beyond any thing that is known to us in Protestant lands? Are you ignorant of the terror under which witnesses would come forward to support the case of Mr M'Gavin,—witnesses under the pastoral care of Mr Scott,—supposing them still in the place?

"None of you could be insensible of such difficulties. Mr M'Gavin could only get direct evidence of his facts, from persons subject to such overwhelming influence.

"Then observe the difficulty arising from the failure of witnesses' memory, when we come to the trial.

"We supposed, when coming to court, Mr Scott would have laid open to us all the information we could have expected. We see lists on the table of all the contributors. We believed such lists must have been preserved, and we demanded that those lists should have been produced, that we might see who the persons were who had contributed, and thus have been enabled to see whether it was true, to a great extent, that money had been so produced. But Mr Scott was a great deal too well advised, to accede to this motion. He said no—you must make out your case by such evidence as you had at the time, and I will not allow you to give other evidence. But, might not a man have good evidence as to general facts, and even as to particular facts, and yet be disabled from proving them, unless he get possession of documents? But this was overruled. What, then, are you to think of Mr Scott claiming those large damages on the ground of malice? If conscious there was no wrong, he should have produced the lists at once.

"It was a miserable apology to say, you will go and tamper with the witnesses. When we shall have given you evidence of the character of Mr M'Gavin, you will see this. Therefore that excuse will not pass—and, when you are sitting there, to determine as to damages, you will not lay out of view, that Mr Scott has taken advantage of the law in this matter, and has had the advantage of delay in bringing the action.

"We did give in our answer to their condescendence, in which we made averments as to more cases than appear in the Issues,—because time and number, &c. were objected to, till at last we were limited to the cases now before you. But that will not confine us in our proof to those particular instances, because we are entitled to prove the general reputation of the facts, as it existed at Glasgow, for our bona fides, and for estimating the claim of damages.

"After the condescendence was adjusted, and the Issues settled, we got a diligence to recover those lists, and we recovered them just about fourteen days ago. You will see, at once, in what advantage that places a party—he had it in his power to give notice of this trial, and we were under the necessity of making investigation over 4037 names in those lists, and to come here prepared to meet statements he might think proper to prove, not one of which he had given notice of before.

"Nor is there any date to all those books that are upon your table.* There had been collectors from 1813 down to 1816 and 1820, at the time those persons so contributed.

"When the books were first produced, they could not be examined till afterwards,—and then dates were wanting,—and then another examination was applied for, for the purpose of seeing whether Mr Scott had any books that could show the dates. This examination took place on the 15th of June, 1821, and I shall read the deposition.†—'Appeared the pursuer, who, being solemnly sworn and examined as a haver, and called upon to produce all books, or writings, tending to instruct the dates of contributions, to the erection of the Roman Catholic chapel, Glasgow, Depones, that he is not in possession of any books, or other documents, tending to instruct the dates of the contributions to the erection of the said chapel; having, when formerly examined as a haver, exhibited and produced the whole documents of the description called for in his possession. That he is not aware that it is usual to affix particular dates to subscription papers, and he was not in the habit of writing the dates on the contribution papers, which he from time to time received from the different collectors. That the contributions were begun about the middle of August, 1813, as far as he remembers; and the last were received about the end of December, 1816. And being specially called on to produce any cash-book, or other book, or writing, in which he marked the sums contained in the Inventory, No. 1. of the productions formerly made, or any part thereof, specifying dates in reference to the said contributions, Depones, that he is not possessed, and to the best of his knowledge, never was possessed of any books, or other documents, specifying the dates of the said contributions, further than may appear from the productions formerly made, particularly No. 1. of Inventory, No. 1. of said productions. And being specially called on to produce copy of his deposit account with any bank in which the sums received, as contributions, from time to time, were entered, or the original of said deposit account, tending to show the dates of such depositions from said contributions, Depones, that he declines producing the deposit accounts called for, because none of them have any tendency to instruct the dates of the said contributions, in consequence of the money contributed from time to time having been received in small sums, and having been partly paid away without being lodged in any bank, and when so lodged, having been mixed with the other cash deposited in bank by the Deponent, on the account of other individuals, and with money borrowed for the erection of the chapel. And being further specially called on to produce the different settled accounts with the contractors, for the erection of the chapel, paid from the contributions so received, tending to show the dates of those contributions, Depones, and declines producing the settled accounts called for, because they cannot, in any way, lead to instruct the dates of the said contributions; the first payment having been made in June, 1814, previous to which date, money

* There is one exception which Mr Moncreiff overlooked. The books are about a hundred in number, and upon a corner of the cover of one of them, viz. Inventory, No. 2. Book, No. 1. is the date, Sept. 12th, 1819.

† For the sake of connection, it is proper to insert here Mr Scott's first deposition, when he delivered the books, of which the dates were wanted.

"At Glasgow, the 4th day of June, 1821 years.

"Appeared the pursuer, Andrew Scott, who, being solemnly sworn ut supra, and interrogated, and called upon to exhibit the lists of contributors, or amounts of contributions, towards the Roman Catholic chapel, lately erected in Glasgow, Depones, and exhibits the whole of the documents of the description called for, in his possession, as per Inventories, Numbers 1, 2, 3, marked by the Deponent and Commissioner, as relative hereto. Farther depones, That the exhibits now made, as contained in their respective parcels, contain the lists and amounts of the whole contributions towards the Roman Catholic establishment in Glasgow, made in Glasgow, or the adjacent counties, down to the present month. And being specially called on, to produce a certain letter, alleged to have been written by Bishop Paterson, the Roman Catholic priest, now, or lately, officiating at Paisley, to the Deponent, shortly after the Deponent had been applied to, to baptize the child of John Drain, depones, That he has not any such letter in his possession, neither does he know, or suspect, where any such letter may be, nor has he destroyed, or fraudulently put away, any such letter: That he made particular search among the letters which he received from Bishop Paterson, and which have been preserved, and he found no letter having any reference either to John Drain, or his child, mentioned in the Interrogatory: That he has not withheld, fraudulently put away, or destroyed, any of the writs called for; neither does he know, or suspect where any of the documents called for may be, unless they are in the possession of the collectors; and all this is truth, as he shall answer to God.

(Signed) ANDREW SCOTT."

had been borrowed for defraying the expense of the erection, and because the production of the said accounts would unnecessarily expose the credit of the establishment. All which is truth.'

"Here, you observe, Mr Scott swears he is not in possession of any books of accounts specifying dates; yet, you observe, it has been proved this day, by two or three of his own witnesses, that he was possessed of a book of accounts, in which the whole of the money collected was entered. The collectors swore, most of them collected once a fortnight, and that then Mr Scott marked the sums in a book. Yet Mr Scott says there are no books or documents specifying dates.

"When I call a pursuer as a party haver of writings, and he does not give a satisfactory answer to demands of papers, I am entitled to represent to you the failure as matter of conclusive presumption against him.

"You see, I got a diligence for books tending to show the dates. I asked him to produce all books or accounts for this purpose, and he swears he is not in possession of any such—and yet his witnesses say, he had a book in which the contributions were entered. He did not tell he had a book without dates. He makes himself judge of that matter, whether he was to mention that or not. He leaves us without the means of seeing that book, or of knowing, through any other person, whether it could have availed us or not.

"We called also for his account with the bank in which he deposited his money, which would have shown, to some extent, the year or months in which those contributions were raised, —and he declines to produce the account with the bank, pretending the money was mixed with other money—an answer away from the purpose—because, although we could not have ascertained how much of the money was of John and James, we could have shown the periods in which the large contributions were raised from that poor and starving congregation.

"We demanded his account of expenditure to the workmen—and the pursuer declines to produce that account too. He says it would expose the credit of the Institution—he will not give us in that account either.

"Thus, those funds had been raised upon those books, not one of which has a date,—and then entered in a book, which contains no date from beginning to end. The money had been deposited in a bank, and he will not show us the bank-book ;—the money had been expended on workmen, and he will not show us the account of expenditure.

"Mr M'Gavin had said, he had no doubt of the faithful expenditure of the money. He only wished to ascertain the dates, from which he would have been enabled to instruct more particularly than he might otherwise be enabled to do, that the money was raised from a poor and starving population.

"And Bishop Cameron stated the management was subject to his control. Mr Scott was only a trustee; and that he (Bishop C.) examined and doquetted the books. Now, I appeal to you, who are merchants, as matters were subject to the control of Bishop Cameron, do you believe the Bishop was so easily satisfied with those accounts that he did not require dates ?

"And, for Mr Scott's own satisfaction, how could he feel satisfied, holding all this money, and having the distribution of it, how could he feel satisfied in keeping books without dates ?

"I fear I detain you long,—but I cannot help it, from the nature of the case.

"Having explained the general nature of Mr M'Gavin's view, I come to explain what remains of the defence.

"The question is, whether what he is charged with was done maliciously, or whether he acted bona fide in what he did.

"We shall lead to you in evidence, in the first place, the general character of Mr M'Gavin —I do not mean that sort of general character which any man, in a respectable condition, may obtain—we shall prove that Mr M'Gavin— [The Reporter is sorry he did not get all Mr Moncreiff's words here taken down. The statement was, in the strongest terms, in favour of Mr M'Gavin's character, mentioning his active exertions for the comforts of the poor, and his zealous endeavours for their education and religious improvement.] "He is a man most remarkable for attention to the interests of the people among whom he lives. He has given a great deal of his money into those voluntary contributions, which were required in the difficulties of Glasgow. He has given a great part of his time to the promotion of Christianity. You know, that in 1816 and 1817, the labouring population was near starvation, and that it required large contributions to preserve them from the utmost wretchedness, and that it was at Glasgow the distress was most felt. Later years were not quite so bad; but, even in these years, large contributions were required. In all those matters, Mr M'Gavin was the secretary, and a principal manager of the contributions. He gave his time and property for the purpose of doing service to the poor, many of whom were Catholics. We shall prove to you, he was the last man that could dream of harbouring a malignant spirit against any individual. It was not intended by him to do any injury to Mr Scott. But I shall not enlarge upon that,—you will hear it from the witnesses. But more—he has a deep interest in the public charities; although in the Town's Hospital he has no management, which is committed to a Committee. He knew and perceived, that in point of fact, the labouring population were in the greatest distress in those years. He knew the principles under which they lived—he knew the general belief, that poor Catholics had been led, notwithstanding their pressing wants, to subscribe and give their money to what they believed to be a pious and necessary work. And then there was Mr Sym's letter, which came after all his information, giving him strong confirmation of every thing he had heard before.

"When we pass from that to what actually took place,—I state, first, we shall prove (it has been stated by one witness already) that Mr Scott, actuated by the principles under which he lives and acts, did state from the pulpit, upon more occasions than one, the necessity of those persons contributing to the erection of the chapel,—and that he did make denunciations against individuals, requiring them, under the strongest statement of the consequences, to come forward with contributions.

"A witness said, he alluded to some who spent their money in drinking or otherwise. That was a thing naturally to be noticed—but it does not alter the case before you. He would naturally say, that those who went a drinking, instead of contributing to the chapel, were guilty of an offence. But the very denunciation in the pulpit, of persons by name, for not contributing towards the erection of the chapel, (with whatever it might be coupled,) does infer a threat, and is as compulsory a proceeding to raise money as any thing can be. What would it be thought, in a congregation here, or any where else, if a clergyman should denounce persons for not having contributed for any purpose. Even there it would be nothing to what it would be in this case. Here an individual would judge for himself—he would be under no fear that he would suffer the perdition of his soul by refusal to comply with the recommendation. But those poor people were in a very different state of mind —and such an address to them, however coupled as it may have been, demonstrates a compulsory spirit was at work. And, we shall prove, the address was not only against individuals, but coupled with denunciations against all in arrear.

"Passing from that, let us come to the actual state of the contributions.

"We were told, that, at the worst, the money levied by Mr Scott, from all the Catholics in Glasgow and neighbourhood, came to little more than a halfpenny a-week from each. You must have distinguished the fallacy of this— for the Catholic population, including the women and children, is only 8245. My friend's argument went upon the supposition, that all these were contributors, or capable of being such; yet he states, that the largest number of subscribers was only 4037. Bishop Cameron estimated the number of nominal Catholics from 14,000 to 18,000, upon reports which he had heard. However that may be, take the population at fourteen thousand, you will find the four thousand would have taken all the men, and more than were in constant attendance on this chapel, for Bishop Cameron said, those who attended to their religious duties did not exceed two thousand.

"You see 4037 contributors in the lists, and the sum of £5,500 was raised, according to the statement of Mr Scott, within two or three years. He says, the contributions were nearly ended in 1816,—though there was a contribution after this for the house, for which the sum raised was £687 18s. 3d.

"Besides this, you will observe, there were contributions at the chapel doors,—payments for marriages, baptisms,—perhaps for confessions,—and farther sums were borrowed—and there is an arrear at this moment, which there are no means of liquidating, except by a continuance of the same system of collection.

"The method followed for raising this money was different from any you ever heard of. They divided those persons into districts, and set collectors over them. One was placed over every public work. He did not go once and say, give me what you can, and I shall not come back again—but he goes once a fortnight, and requires them to pay a sum of money. The collectors examined say, they asked them to pay what they could, and no more. But they are interested, and we could not expect them, if they used extortion, to come here and swear they did so. They are interested witnesses, and only three or four of them were brought here. There were upwards of 50 or 60 in waiting. Some might have used extortion, and not others. They collected an immense sum of money in shillings and sixpences, once a fortnight.

"I have a state of the contribution, and you will see what is the just inference. The number of contributors who paid £10 and upwards, was 27. That would only make £270, supposing at £10 each. The number of contributors who paid from £10 to £7, was only 45;—those from £7 to £5, 61;—those from £5 to £4, 168. From £4 to £3, 248 persons contributed;—from £3 to £2, 401 persons;—from £2 to £1, 749 persons;—from £1 to 10s. 692 persons;—from 10s. to 5s., 597;—and under 5s., 1049 persons.—Now, I ask you, if you can suppose, that, in the years in which this collection was going on, it was possible to collect from 4037 persons—or, deduct the two or three hundred, or perhaps, 1000 persons, till we come to those who paid in single shillings,—do you suppose £5000, or nearly so, was collected in shillings, once a fortnight, from labouring people, without occasioning them great distress? There is a prima facie case against them. It is not to be imagined, those poor labourers could have spared 1s. or 6d. in a week, in such a manner, and at a time of general starvation among the labouring classes.

"This leads me to call your attention to the most essential fact, that those contributions were levied in those very years when contributions were raised in Glasgow for the support of the lower orders. What are you to think, then, of a collection which, in those years, was taken from persons who were receiving contributions from the public? Would not you say, that the money so contributed for the support of the labouring poor, was carried to Mr Scott for building his chapel? We shall prove that numerous paupers, upon the roll, did contribute in those years to the erection of the chapel. They were receiving sums from the voluntary contribution of the public, on account of their poverty, and, at the same period, were under the necessity of paying towards the erection of the chapel.—There were even paupers on the Hospital list, who, at the same time, were contributing towards the erection of this chapel. —And how, then, I ask, could any one be said to be guilty of malice, by stating that the money was extorted from a poor and starving population?

"Having gone thus far, I come to the special Issues, upon which I shall say a very few words.

"The first which we shall prove, is the 6th Issue, that which stands at the foot of the tenth page of the printed Issues in your hands. My friend on the other side of the bar made a faint attempt to touch it.—You were told it was positively denied. The Issue is: 'Whether, in the year 1814, the pursuer did apply to Mr Haughton Fleming, or to Mr Bowman Fleming, who carried on a dye-work in Hutchesontown, Glasgow, to retain in their hands, a portion of the weekly earnings of such Catholics as were employed in their works, to be applied toward building said Roman Catholic chapel.' They deny that Mr Scott applied to those gentlemen, asking them to retain the wages of the labourers:—and they called two witnesses who told you they saw Mr Scott at the manufactory. What was the use of calling those persons, I know not. You will hear from Mr Fleming that he refused to comply with a request made by Mr Scott, for the purpose of retaining part of the wages of his workmen. And you will be able to apply this to the whole colour of this case.—Mr Haughton Fleming is dead. But we shall prove by his brother quite enough to stand upon that Issue.

"To go back to the case of Courtney,—you see the question is, 'Whether, on or about the month of October, 1814, the pursuer did refuse to baptize the child of Henry Courtney, labourer, lately in Anderston, and now in Cowcaddens, Glasgow, a person of the Roman Catholic persuasion, and one of the contributors to the Roman Catholic chapel aforesaid; because he, Courtney, was in arrear of his contribution, until the said Courtney should pay the said arrears to the collectors for the chapel? And whether, at or about Easter, 1815, the pursuer did refuse confession to the said Courtney, because he had not paid his contribution to the said chapel?'

"You will find we shall prove this case directly, and my friend opposite seemed to be aware of that.

"Then you come to the case of M'Geechie, —'Whether, about six years ago, the pursuer did refuse to baptize the child of Philip M'Geechie, now in Manchester, late resident in Glasgow, a person of the Roman Catholic persuasion, and a member of the pursuer's congregation; because the said M'Geechie was in arrear of his contribution to the said chapel?'

"With regard to that case, I conceived it was my duty to admit, that, upon their evidence, it would be impossible for me to ask a verdict from you upon that Issue.—[The defender's agent signified, that they did not mean to abandon that Issue, considering it proved by Robertson on his cross-examination.]—They have proved (continued Mr M.), that M'Geechie stated to a witness that it was some time before he was tried, that he had gone upon one occasion with Robertson to Mr Scott about a child —but they are not entitled to tie us down upon this Issue. It is not whether before a particular date, but whether about six years ago, which is a general term, the fact occurred.—If so, you see the evidence. Robertson was a confused witness. With some difficulty I was able to extract the fact from him, that Mr Scott complained of M'Geechie not having attended church. But it is proved he did also expressly state he would not baptize the child unless M'Geechie paid 5s. to the chapel.—And Robertson remonstrated, and said the child might die and go to hell, upon which Scott's answer was, that was not his business.—They prove Robertson went with M'Geechie to Scott—and then we have what Robertson said passed.

"It is one of our misfortunes to have to resort to those low persons. Placed in that situation, what could we do? We wanted M'Geechie, but we could not find him—they did not tell us he was at Lancaster. We have brought all the evidence we could—and I leave it to you to judge of the case from the evidence —considering the difficulty of our getting that evidence, it is most material in favour of the truth of it, that it was extracted from the witness, apparently against his will.

"Then we come to the case of Drain,— 'Whether, on or about the month of June, 1818, the pursuer did refuse to baptize the child of John Drain, weaver in Duke Street, Glasgow, one of the contributors to the Catholic chapel aforesaid, because the said Drain was then in arrears of his contribution to said chapel?'

"We were told he married one woman, and afterwards another:—there is not a particle of evidence to show this—and Drain is not incapacitated as a witness. We shall be able to prove that application was made to Mr Scott for baptism, and that he refused, on the ground of the contribution not having been paid. On his refusal, a different person was gone to, who baptized the child. That has been proved by the pursuer, and we shall prove how that happened.

"Whether Mr M'Gavin acted with falsehood and malice, is the question for you to determine. And that will never go down with the world if Mr M'Gavin was well-founded in the statement that those things happened—nor will you give damages against him in this civil court.

"But, look at the beginning, progress, object, and scope of the whole of his writings: the interest he regarded was that of the public, and not his own interest. Look to the long period during which he has devoted himself to the most praiseworthy labour. Although it may appear to you that passages are perhaps made too strong; looking at the whole scope and connection of what he wrote, it is impossible for you to say the passages were written from motives of malice.

"I already explained to you how much evidence has been lost to us, and how the delay in bringing the action prevented us from proving many more facts which had come to Mr M'Gavin's knowledge.

"The work of Mr M'Gavin is now in two volumes. It has been matter of honourable labour to him. It evinces uncommon talents, learning, and industry; and none can read it without thinking that it does the highest honour to his heart, and proves the true sincerity of religious feeling by which he has been actuated."

[From the fatigue of incessant writing for eleven hours, together with the suffocating heat of the place, the short-hand writer was taken ill, and obliged to retire, at the conclusion of Mr Moncreiff's speech, which was delivered throughout in a style of most impressive eloquence. What follows is taken, partly from newspaper reports, and partly furnished by the recollection of gentlemen who were present. The defender, Mr Sym, sustains the disadvantage of not having a report of Mr Murray's speech in his defence, for in the newspapers, there is only the following short notice:—"Mr Murray then addressed the Jury for the defender, Mr Sym, and contended that there was no ground for making his client a party in the cause, as, in writing the letter contained in the third Issue, he only acted in the discharge of his official duty." And Mr M'Gavin sustains the disadvantage of not having the evidence of his witnesses taken down so strictly verbatim as was that for Mr Scott. This a discerning public will be able to appreciate; and they may rest assured, that if they have not all the words, and the very words that were deponed, the utmost pains have been taken to prevent the admission of a single idea but what was distinctly sworn to; for which purpose the manuscript was revised by several gentlemen of both Edinburgh and Glasgow, who were present at the trial.]

The first witness called for the defence, was HENRY MONTEITH, Esq., M.P. Examined by Mr MONCREIFF.

Q. Have you been long acquainted with Mr M'Gavin?—A. I have been acquainted with him for several years.

Q. Has your acquaintance with him been in public or in private life?—A. In both, but chiefly in public.

Q. Does it consist with your knowledge, that he has been very attentive to the state of the poor, and has taken an active part in promoting public charities in Glasgow?

Mr COCKBURN—"Don't answer that question."

Here a good deal of conversation took place between the counsel on both sides, and the Lord Chief Commissioner, which issued in the objection being sustained; and evidence was not allowed to be led on the subject of the question put to the witness, or on the general good character of Mr M'Gavin; on which a bill of exceptions was taken by Mr Moncreiff.

The Rev. Dr M'GILL, professor of divinity in Glasgow University, was next called; but as his evidence bore upon the same points, he was immediately allowed to withdraw.

The depositions given by the pursuer, Mr Scott, when examined as a haver, under the authority of the Jury Court, were then tendered in evidence, and desired to be read to the Jury; but it was maintained by the counsel for the pursuer, that these depositions could not be read in evidence at the trial; and the court sustained their objection. They were accordingly not read; on which a bill of exceptions was again taken for the defenders.

The defender's counsel then tendered in evidence, certain receipts for money given by Mr M'Gavin, out of the profits of his publication, (The Protestant,) which receipts had been previously lodged in process.

Mr COCKBURN—"These cannot be received in evidence. They do not bear to be from the profits of The Protestant."

Mr MONCREIFF—"Hand the parcel to the bench."

The Lord Chief Commissioner having read one of the receipts, said, "This bears to be part of the profits of a work entitled The Protestant "

Mr COCKBURN—"We don't know that it is so."

The objection was sustained.

The first two volumes of The Protestant were given in without objection. The Catholic Vindicator was offered in evidence, but objected to on the ground that no Issue was made concerning it. The objection, however, not being pressed, the Vindicator was received; as were also the handbills announcing its publication, with the contents of the weekly numbers.

ALEXANDER BUCHANAN was then called.

Mr MURRAY—Are you superintendent of the poor in Glasgow?—A. I am, under the managers of the Town's Hospital.

Mr COCKBURN—I have a question or two to ask this witness. Have you not been employed as an agent for the defender, Mr M'Gavin, to procure evidence for him in this cause?—A. Never.

Mr MURRAY—How long have you held the office of superintendent of the poor, connected with the Town's Hospital?—A. For several years; I think, since 1815.

Q. Is it your duty to visit the poor, and make yourself acquainted with their circumstances?—A. When persons apply to the Hospital for relief, I am instructed by the committee to visit them in their own houses, to inquire into their state, and to report.

Q. Were you acquainted with the condition of the poor and labouring classes, in the years 1815, 1816, and 1817?—A. Yes; well acquainted with it

Q. Was not that a period of great distress among the poor and labouring people in Glasgow and the neighbourhood?—A. It was a time of very great distress, from want of employment for labourers, and the dearth of provisions. A large sum was raised for their relief by public subscription.

Q. Was it, during that period, generally reported and believed, that poor labouring persons were contributing for the building of the Roman Catholic chapel in Glasgow?—A. That was reported, and believed very generally.

Q. Did you ever learn that poor persons did contribute?—A. When I visited applicants for the Hospital charity, whom I knew to be Catholics, or who told me they were so, I sometimes put the question, Whether they were subscribers to the chapel? and many have told me that they were. I have the Hospital books here, and can give the names of several.

Q. Do you know one Widow Hanlin?

Mr COCKBURN—"Don't answer that question."

Mr JEFFREY argued, that the defender was not entitled to go into a proof of that case, seeing he had not taken an Issue upon it. "We offered him," said he, "an Issue on that point, and he declined it." Defender's counsel gave signs of dissent, but they did not reply to the assertion. The objection was sustained, and the witness was allowed to withdraw. He had brought in with him a large bundle of books, apparently for the purpose of reference, had he been examined as to particulars.*

BOWMAN FLEMING, Merchant, was called.

Mr MONCREIFF—You were about the year 1814 proprietor of a dye-work in Glasgow?—A. I was a partner of a company that had such a work in the neighbourhood.

Q. Were there Catholics employed in the work?—A. Yes, there were several who professed to be such.

Q. How many?—A. I believe from a dozen to twenty.

Q. Did you ever see Mr Scott, the Catholic priest, about the work, or calling upon the workmen?—A. No: I was not often there. My brother, Haughton, had the management.

Q. Was he a partner in the concern?—A. He was.

Q. And is since deceased?—A. Yes.

Q. Do you know if Mr Scott ever applied to him about the workmen subscribing to the new chapel?—A. My brother told me that he did apply.

Q. What did he tell you?—A. That Mr Scott called upon him, and requested him to retain a part of the weekly wages of the Catholic workmen, to be applied towards the building of the chapel. My brother wished to know whether I thought he should comply with Mr Scott's request; and I said, I thought he should not.

Q. Did you give your opinion immediately, or take time to consider of it?—A. I thought the thing so improper, that I instantly said I would not consent to it.

Q. Were any of the men's wages then stopped on that account?—A. Not that I know of.

HENRY COURTNEY, labourer.

Q. Were you a member of Mr Scott's congregation about the year 1815?—A. I was.

Q. Had you a child to baptize, and did you apply to Mr Scott for baptism?—A. Yes.

* It now appeared that the defenders, or rather their counsel, had not been aware that the mode of defence they were pursuing was inadmissible, according to the rules of the Jury Court; the court itself being new in Scotland, and this a novel case, the first of its kind. The defenders were libelled for having falsely and maliciously made certain statements. They very naturally presumed, that if they could prove these statements to be true, it would rebut the charge of their falsehood at least, and they never doubted but they would be allowed a proof on the import of all the seven points at Issue. Widow Hanlin herself was among their witnesses, and would either have proved or disproved the story relating to herself, had she been examined upon it; but this was not consistent with the rule. The defenders were confined in their proof to the last four Issues, which shut them up from the examination of a great number of their witnesses, as to the facts bearing upon the matters libelled in the others. It will naturally be asked, Why did not the defenders take Issues for themselves on these points? But this the court would not grant without a particular condescendence on names, time, place, and circumstances, which the defenders could not make out, without access to the pursuer's subscription lists. They applied for a diligence to recover these before the Issues were adjusted; but this was opposed by the pursuer, and refused by the court. They afterwards obtained a diligence to recover these lists, and did recover them, but the Issues being now fixed, they could not found an Issue upon them.

Q. Did he refuse to do it, and for what reason?—A. He said, I was behind in my subscriptions for the chapel, and that before he would baptize the child, I must pay five shillings.

Q. Did you pay the five shillings then?—A. I went home and told my wife what passed. She was still in bed, not recovered; and we had only three shillings in the world.

Q. When was it that you called on Mr Scott?—A. On a Saturday evening.

Q. Did he afterwards baptize your child?—A. Not till I had paid the five shillings. I borrowed two shillings from a neighbour, paid the money, and had the child baptized on the Sunday.

Q. Did you give the money to Mr Scott?—A. No; it was to the collector.

Mr COCKBURN—Do you still belong to Mr Scott's congregation?—A. No; I left him soon after.

Q. What was the cause of your leaving him?—A. I was not able to pay for a seat; and he told me to go and sit with the poor people.

Q. And you did not like that?—A. No.

Q. And you took offence, and went away?—Answer not distinctly heard.

Q. What church do you now belong to?—A. I have not taken up with any yet.

Some questions were put by the court, which witness answered in nearly the same terms as above

MARY MORGAN, wife of Henry Courtney, was called.

LORD GILLIES—"Call back Henry Courtney." He was called, but was out of hearing.

Mary Morgan corroborated her husband's evidence, as to his coming home one night, while she was still in bed, unrecovered from her lying-in, and telling her that Mr Scott would not baptize the child unless he would pay five shillings. She knew that there was only three shillings in the house. They were very poor. She did not know where he got the two shillings; but she understood that he had paid the money on Sunday morning, as the child was taken away to be baptized.

JOHN DRAIN was called, but as he was to be brought from Edinburgh jail, to which he had been conveyed from the jail of Glasgow, some delay took place. In the meantime appeared his wife, ISABELLA SCOTT, alias Drain.

Do you recollect going with your husband, in the year 1818, to Mr Scott to get a child baptized?—A. Yes.

Q. Did Mr Scott refuse to do it?—A. I stood in the lobby, with the child in my arms, while my husband went in to ask him; and he came out, and told me that Mr Scott would not do it without money, which we had not to give.

Q. Was the child sick?—A. It was very ill. We thought it was going to die; and were very anxious to have it baptized, so we went immediately to Paisley, and had it done there.

Q. Who baptized it in Paisley?—A. It was either Bishop Paterson, or the Catholic priest there. I am not sure which. I never saw him before.

Q. Would you know the person if you saw him again?—A. I suppose I would.

Bishop Paterson was requested to stand up.

Q. Is that the gentleman?—A. What, that lusty man? No; that is not the man.*

John Drain not being yet arrived, it was proposed to call some other of the witnesses.

SEPTIMUS ELLIS, Esq.

Q. You have taken a good deal of interest in the supply of the poor in Glasgow?—A. I have had a good deal to do in that way.

Q. Do you know what was the state of the poor and labouring classes in the years 1815, 1816, and 1817?—A. They were in great distress indeed, during these years, from want of employment and dearth of provisions.

Q. Was it then generally reported and believed in Glasgow, that the Roman Catholic chapel was built in a great measure at the expense of the labouring poor?—A. That was a subject of general conversation at the time; and it was very generally believed.

Q. Do you know that Mr Scott refused the sacraments to those who did not contribute to the building?—A. With regard to that I cannot speak from my own knowledge.

Messrs. JAMES CLELAND, ROBERT DICKIE, HENRY LEISHMAN, ROBERT HOOD, GEORGE SWANSON, and MICHAEL MILLER, all deponed to the same effect as Mr ELLIS, with regard to the great poverty and distress among the labouring classes, in 1815, 1816, and 1817, and that it was then very generally reported and believed in Glasgow, that poor labourers were contributing for the Catholic chapel.

JOHN DRAIN.

Q. Had you a child by Isabella Scott, in 1818?—A. Yes.

Q. And did you take it to Mr Scott for baptism?—A. The child was very ill and like to die; we were very anxious to have it baptized; and had travelled all the way from —— [it is believed Girvan was the place.] I applied to Mr Scott, and he would not do it, unless I would pay ten shillings.

Q. Were you regularly married to Isabella Scott?—A. No.

Q. Did Mr Scott know this?—A. He asked me about my marriage, and I told him that it was irregular, and that I had paid the fine on that account.

Q. Well, what did he say then?—A. He said,

* Bishop Paterson proved from the baptismal register kept at Paisley, that John Drain had a child baptized by Mr M'Lachlan, the officiating priest there, the 30th of July 1818. See page 41.

if I could afford to pay twenty-five shillings for an irregular marriage, I could easily afford ten shillings for the house of God. I had not the money, and I came away. We went to Paisley, and had it baptized there.

Q. Who baptized it in Paisley?—A. I am not sure of his name.

Q. Look at that gentleman, (pointing to Bishop Paterson,) Was it he?—A. No.

CROSS-EXAMINED.

Q. Have you not been for some time in Glasgow jail; and are you not now a prisoner?—A. Yes.

Q. What were you in jail for?—A. I was with some persons who had a web not rightly come by. They gave me the blame of it, and I was taken up.

Q. Were you not a deserter from the army?—A. I did desert; but I took the benefit of the king's proclamation, and have the protection in my pocket.

Q. Were you married to Christian Mure?—Mr Moncreiff objected to the question.

LORD CHIEF COMMISSIONER—"You need not answer that question, unless you please."

Witness admitted that Mure had been called his wife; but as to his being really married to her, he said, I leave you to prove that.

The case being thus closed for the defence, Mr JEFFREY rose to reply. He spoke, with great eloquence and animation, for nearly two hours. The publisher has not seen a distinct report of this speech, and he believes one does not exist, which he regrets exceedingly.* Mr Jeffrey dwelt at considerable length on the deficiency of the defenders' proof. Mr Fleming, he said, was but the ghost of a witness, as he repeated only the testimony of his deceased brother. He knew what the law was on that point, but did not commend the wisdom of it. In the Issue concerning Courtney, he said, there was only one witness, Courtney himself, which was not sufficient evidence. The testimony of his wife was nothing at all, as she only spoke from hearsay. He laid great stress on the bad character of Drain, from which, he said, little dependence could be placed on his testimony. As for the case of M'Geechie, he observed, that his learned friend (Mr Moncreiff) seemed about to give up that, when an evil influence from behind (where the defender sat) induced him to persist in it, though supported only by the contradictory testimony of the man Robertson.

The learned gentleman commented at considerable length on the monstrous statement of Mr M'Gavin, that the extortions practised by Mr Scott had amounted to nearly £20,000, while it was proved in court that day, that the total amount levied by him from persons of all descriptions, in and about Glasgow, was under £6000. He animadverted, with great severity, and in a manner peculiar to himself, on the spirit manifested by Mr M'Gavin, whom he designated a twopenny scribbler, a lay-divine, a would-be-theologian, a mercantile polemic, &c. &c.; and when he concluded, he was loudly cheered by the crowd that occupied the back part of the hall, at which the Lord Chief Commissioner expressed his displeasure.

LORD CHIEF COMMISSIONER in summing up, directed the Jury to compare the Issues with the evidence which they had heard. There were some of the facts libelled, particularly in the second Issue on which no evidence at all seemed to be led, though the case of the men at the public work, part of whose wages the pursuer is said to have asked to be retained, appears to have evidence in support of it, in the testimony of the witness, Fleming, adduced in proof of the sixth Issue. His Lordship said, he had consulted his brethren, before they left the bench, (they not finding it convenient to stay till so late an hour,) and they were of opinion with him, that one witness, swearing distinctly to each of a series of Issues like the present, was legal evidence of the general fact to which they related. It was objected to the evidence of Fleming, that he reported only the words of a deceased person; but according to the law of Scotland, that was legal evidence. The evidence of Courtney, he said, was corroborated so far by his wife, that she spoke distinctly to circumstances connected with the fact, which were within her own knowledge. Drain was not a very reputable witness; yet, as he was not convicted of any crime, his testimony could not be refused; and it was besides corroborated by that of Isabella Scott. There seems to be no evidence in proof of the fifth Issue, that relating to M'Geechie, for besides the confused appearance of the witness, Robertson, it is clear the thing could not have taken place later than 1813. It is your duty, Gentlemen of the Jury, to weigh the evidence which has been adduced before you, on both sides of the question, and to give a verdict, according to your consciences, between, I believe, a respectable gentleman on the one hand, and a very worthy clergyman on the other.

* The following advertisement was published in the CLXI. Number of The Protestant, on the 11th of August. "The speech of Mr Jeffrey alone occupied about two hours; and from his amazing rapidity, I suppose, it must have contained fifty thousand words, many of them new, and curiously compounded. I wish it were possible to recover them all, or even a tithe of them; and I hereby intimate, that if any of the gentlemen who were present, and took notes, will furnish me with a correct report, I shall cheerfully allow a handsome remuneration for his trouble, provided I receive it by the 1st of September." And Mr Dow, the short-hand writer, was requested by letter, to apply to Mr Jeffrey, to see if he would draw up, or dictate a report of his speech, for the expense of which Mr Dow was authorized to go to the extent of twenty guineas; but from some cause or other, such report could not be obtained.

The Jury retired for upwards of an hour. A little before five in the morning they returned to the box.

CLERK of COURT—"Gentlemen, are you agreed in your verdict?"

A JURYMAN—"We are agreed."

CLERK—"What is it?"

FOREMAN of the JURY—"The Jury find for the pursuer, against the defender, Mr M'Gavin, damages £100; against the defender, Mr Sym, £20; and against the defenders, A. & J. Duncan, 1s."

THE END.